Trustee v.
Jardine.

Succession — Vesting — Fee or Liferent — Direction to "divide" residue among children—Restriction of child's share to liferent with fee to issue—Repugnancy.

By his settlement a testator directed his trustees "to divide" the residue of his estate "equally among" his children, and "with regard to the portion of residue which may effier or belong to" one of his sons, he appointed his trustees to "hold and invest the same in their own names" for the son and the son's widow in liferent allenary and for the son's issue in fee.

The son having died unmarried, held that his share of residue had vested in him in fee.

By his settlement, dated 6th May 1878, and registered in the Books^{2D} Division of Council and Session 24th January 1879, Andrew Cowan senior conveyed his whole estate to trustees, and directed them, in the fifth place, "to set apart and to invest with the Clyde Navigation Trustees, or in the purchase of good railway debentures, or to lend on good heritable security, for behoof of my son Peter Cowan, the sum of One thousand pounds sterling, and to pay to him half-yearly during his life for his liferent and alimentary use allenary the whole interest or income that may be derived therefrom, and in the event of the said Peter Cowan dying and being survived by his wife, I will and appoint that she shall so long as she continues unmarried receive half-yearly for her liferent and alimentary use allenary the interest or income which may be derivable on said sum of One thousand pounds sterling, and after the decease of the longest liver of the said Peter Cowan and his wife or of her entering into a second marriage, whichever of these events shall first happen, I direct and appoint my said trustees to divide the said sum of One thousand pounds equally among the lawful issue of the said Peter Cowan: Declaring, however, with regard to this last-mentioned legacy that I give my trustees a full discretionary power in the event of the said Peter Cowan being desirous to establish himself in business to advance and pay to him for that purpose such sum as my trustees may consider proper, but in no case to exceed the sum of Five hundred pounds, and whatever sum my said trustees shall think proper to advance to my said son not exceeding Five hundred pounds as aforesaid, shall be imputed as part payment of said legacy of One thousand pounds, and which will proportionally reduce the liferent of said legacy to the said Peter Cowan or his wife, and also the amount to be divided ultimately among the children of the said Peter Cowan: And the rest, residue, and remainder of my said means and estate I direct and appoint my said trustees to divide equally among the said James Cowan, Peter Cowan, Andrew Cowan, and June 4, 1913. Alexander Cowan, and the said Helen Cowan, Isabella Cowan, and Mary Cowan, and in the event of any of my said residuary legatees dying leaving lawful issue, such issue shall succeed equally to the share which would have fallen to the parent if alive, and in the event of any of my said residuary legatees predeceasing me and without leaving lawful issue, the share of the predeceaser shall be divided equally among my said residuary legatees who shall survive me, and with regard to the portion of residue which may effeir or belong to the said Peter Cowan, I will and appoint that my said trustees shall hold and invest the same in their own names for behoof of the said Peter Cowan, whom failing, for behoof of his wife so long as she may remain unmarried after his decease, and for behoof of the lawful issue of the said Peter Cowan in the same way and manner as is provided in regard to the sum of One thousand pounds mentioned in the fifth place hereof, only it shall not be in the power of my said trustees to break upon the capital of the portion of residue that may effeir to the said Peter Cowan, with the view of making any advance to him to establish him in business or otherwise."

Cowan's
Trustee v.
Jardine.

The residuary legatees were children of the testator, and they all survived the testator except Andrew Cowan junior, who predeceased him without issue. Peter Cowan never married, and died in 1911, leaving a settlement. Questions having arisen with regard, inter alia, to the distribution of his share of residue, a special case was presented to the Court.

The first party was the sole surviving trustee under Andrew Cowan senior's settlement; the second party was the residuary legatee under Peter Cowan's settlement; the third party was one of the residuary legatees under Andrew Cowan senior's settlement; and the fourth parties were the children of a son of the testator who survived him but was not one of his residuary legatees.

The second party contended that Peter Cowan's share of residue under the testator's will vested in him and belonged to the second party as his residuary legatee.

The third party contended that the share in question fell into the residuary estate of the testator at the death of Peter Cowan, or alternatively, that it fell into intestacy.

The fourth parties contended that the share of residue in question fell into intestacy at Peter Cowan's death.

The following question of law was, inter alia, presented for the opinion and judgment of the Court;—" (1) Did the fee of the share of residue which effeired to the late Peter Cowan (a) vest in him, or (b) fall into residue, or (c) form intestate estate of the testator? "

The case was heard before the Second Division on 23rd May 1913.

Argued for the second party;—There was in the will an absolute gift of the residue in favour of the testator's children, followed, in Peter's case, by a direction that his share was to be held for him in life and his issue in fee. It was now well settled that this direction did not detract from the initial gift of fee, and that Peter's share vested in him a morte testatoris subject only to defeasance in the event which did not happen, of his leaving issue.¹ A direction to "divide among" the children was equivalent to a gift of fee.

 no application, for that rule required that there should be an initial gift of fee, expressed in such words as a declaration that the residue was to "belong to" the beneficiaries.² A mere direction to trustees to "divide" the fund, as in this case, did not amount to a gift. The case accordingly belonged to the class of which *Macgregor's Trustees v. Macgregor*³ was a type, where the right was held to be limited to one of liferent. The share of residue provided for Peter, not being disposed of by the settlement and not being subject to accretion, fell into intestacy.⁴

Cowan's
 Trustee v.
 Jardine.

At advising on 4th June 1913,—

LORD DUNDAS.—[After narrating the facts]—The first question put to us in the case is: "Did the fee of the share of residue which effeired to the late Peter Cowan (a) vest in him, or (b) fall into residue, or (c) form intestate estate of the testator?" No argument was submitted to us in favour of the second of these contentions. As between the first and third of them, I am of opinion that the first must prevail. I think the case falls within the principle of a well-known series of cases—I shall allude to some of them presently—of which the earliest important example is Lindsay's Trustees,⁵ and one of the latest is Tweeddale's Trustees.¹ I use the word "principle" in the sense in which Lord President Dunedin (in *Tweeddale's Trustees*¹) considered it "convenient, if not strictly accurate, to speak of the principle of so-and-so as laid down in a case or a series of cases." In the same case Lord Low said, at p. 272: "The principle recognised in all these cases seems to me to be that where there is a direct bequest, or a direction to trustees to pay or convey to a daughter, in terms, which according to the natural meaning of the language used, import a gift, that gift will not be recalled by a subsequent direction to the trustees to hold the fund for, or settle it upon, the daughter in liferent, for her liferent use alienably, and her children in fee, except in so far as may be requisite to give effect to these purposes, and, accordingly, if there are no children, the fee will vest absolutely in the daughter, and be in bonis of her at her death." It may be worth while to note that the provision there in question was declared to be purely alimentary. I think the principle thus stated applies, mutatis mutandis, to the present case. I cannot accept the argument that there are here no sufficient words of original gift to Peter Cowan of his share of residue to bring the case within the doctrine expressed by Lord Low. I consider that the direction to the trustees to "divide" the residue "equally among" the beneficiaries imports, according to the natural meaning of the language used, a gift to each of his share; and one may note, for what it is worth, the use of the word "belong," which is used disjunctively along with "effeir" in regard to Peter's share. It seems to me that "divide among" is as good a phrase of gift as the words occurring in some, at least, of the series of cases to which I have alluded. In *Lindsay's Trustees*⁵ the residue

June 4, 1913. was directed to be "divided equally among" the truster's whole children, the shares to vest at his death. In *Dalglish's Trustees*¹ the direction was to divide into equal shares to be paid to the beneficiaries. In *Logan's Trustees*² the residue was to "belong to and be divided among" the children in equal proportions. In *Stewart's Trustees*³ the direction was to convey equally among them share and share alike. In *Mackay's Trustees*⁴ the direction was to "divide or convey or pay and make over" to and among the children equally. In *Dunlop's Trustees*⁵ the trustees were directed to hold and set apart the principal sum of £10,000 which the truster left and bequeathed to the children of his deceased sister. In *Tweeddale's Trustees*⁶ the direction was to "make payment." By way of contrast, it may be worth while to refer to Muir's Trustees,⁷ where the trustees were directed to retain the whole residue for behoof of the truster's children, and to divide the same amongst them in certain proportions, the shares of sons and daughters respectively being to be set aside and held and invested and otherwise dealt with as after mentioned; and as regards the shares falling to sons, the trustees were directed to hold and invest the same in their own names as trustees for behoof of the sons respectively in liferent, for their alimentary liferent uses alienably and for behoof of their respective issue in fee, but with power notwithstanding to make advances in their discretion to the sons out of the capital of their respective shares. The Court held that the trust-deed did not import an absolute gift of the capital of their shares of residue to the sons. But Lord McLaren, who gave the opinion of the Court, stated the general rule as follows, at p. 557: "If a testator begins by making an unqualified division of his estate or residue amongst children, and then by a subsequent clause empowers his trustees to retain the shares of one or more of them, and to pay the income to the child or children for life, and the fee or capital to their issue, it may very well be that the power is only given to the trustees for the protection of the immediate beneficiaries. Accordingly, if one of these should die without issue, and leaving a will, it may be held that the original gift was not displaced, but its effect only suspended during the lifetime of the beneficiary, and for his or her protection. . . . It is, however, essential to the proper application of this principle of construction that there should be an independent unqualified gift to the immediate beneficiary, capable of taking effect when the special trust fails or is exhausted." Again, in the recent case of Macgregor's Trustees,⁸ where the residue was directed to be held "in trust for behoof of such of my children as shall survive me, . . . equally, share and share alike, subject to the conditions following, viz., . . . in the case of my daughters I direct my trustees to retain and hold their shares, original and accreting, for their liferent alimentary use alienably, . . . and for the issue of their bodies, equally among such issue in fee," the Court held that the share of a daughter who survived the truster, but died unmarried, had not vested in her, because, as the Lord President put it, "you must first find words which purport to bestow a certain gift or interest. Now here there is no direct provision of a gift or interest at all." It seems to me, therefore, that as matter of construction of the settlement before us, and in the light of the authorities, we must hold (adapting Lord Low's criterion to the present circumstances) that the testator's settlement imported a gift to Peter Cowan of his share of residue, which was not recalled by the subsequent direction to hold and invest it for his liferent alimentary use and for that of his widow, if he had left one, and for his children in fee, except in so far as it might be requisite to give effect to these purposes; and accordingly, that as Peter Cowan was never married, the fee vested absolutely in Peter, and was in bonis of him at his death.—[His Lordship then dealt with a question with which this report is not concerned.]

Right in Security—Bond and disposition in security—"Default in payment"—Notice requisite to constitute default and justify action of maills and duties—Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 101), sec. 119, Sched. FF (1) (2).

The creditor under a bond and disposition in security in the statutory form given in Schedule FF (1) of the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868, served upon the debtor a schedule of intimation, requisition, and protest in the form given in Schedule FF (2) of the Act, which stated that "payment is now required" of the principal sum due under the bond with interest to date, and that if after the expiry of three months the sums "of which payment is now required" should not be paid, then the creditor "may proceed to sell" the lands disposed in security. Ten days later he brought an action of maills and duties to obtain possession of the lands and to uplift the rents. The debtor was not in arrear with interest.

Held that the schedule of intimation was a demand for immediate payment; that the debtor not having paid instantly was in "default in payment" within the meaning of sec. 119 of the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868; and that accordingly the action was competent.

ON 21st February 1913 Alexander Buttery M'Aras, Armadale, and others, brought an action of maills and duties in the Sheriff Court at Airdrie against John Anderson, builder, Airdrie. The action concluded for declarator that the pursuers had right to the rents, maills, and duties of the heritable subjects No. 53 Kippen Street, Airdrie, belonging to the defender, or to so much thereof as would satisfy and pay to the pursuers the sum of £750 due to them by the defender.

position in security, recorded on 12th December 1904, for £750, by which he disposed in security, inter alia, the subjects 53 Kippen Street, Airdrie, belonging to him in favour of Thomas Chapman, Airdrie. The pursuers became the creditors under the bond by various assignments in their favour. The bond was in the statutory form provided by the Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868,* Schedule FF (1), and contained the clause,—“ I assign the rents.” The defender was by the bond taken bound to repay the principal sum of £750 at Whitsunday 1905 with interest at 5 per cent per annum to said term, and half-yearly thereafter at Whitsunday and Martinmas during non-payment.

On 11th February 1913 schedules of intimation, requisition, and protest in the form provided by the Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868, Schedule FF (2), were served upon the defender. The schedules stated that “ payment is now required of [the sum due under the bond] and of the sum of . . . being the interest due at present on the said principal sum with such further sum of interest as shall accrue on the said proportion of principal sum till paid: And I further give you notice that, if at the expiry of the period of three months from the date hereof, the sums, principal and interest, and liquidate penalty incurred and to be incurred, of which payment is now required shall not be paid in terms of the said bond and disposition in security, then the said Alexander Buttery M'Ara or the person or persons who may then be in right of the said bond and disposition in security, may proceed to sell the lands and others thereby conveyed in the manner provided by the Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868, and with all powers and privileges conferred on or competent to creditors under bonds and dispositions in security by that Act.”

The pursuers averred:—(Cond. 5) “ The defender the said John Anderson has been frequently called upon to pay said bond, and in particular schedules of intimation, requisition, and protest were served upon him on 11th February 1913, notifying him that payment was then required of the principal sum due under the said bond, and of the interest due at that date on the said principal sum,

* The Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 101), enacts:—Sec. 119. “ The import of the clauses of the form of No. 1 of the Schedule FF occurring in any bond and disposition in security . . . shall be as follows:— . . . the clause of assignment of rents shall be held to import an assignment to the creditor . . . to the rents to become due or payable from and after the date from which interest on the sum in the security commences to run . . . including therein a power to the creditor . . . on default in payment to enter into possession of the lands disposed in security and uplift the rents thereof . . . the clause . . . on default in payment granting power of sale shall have the same import . . . as if it had been thereby further provided and declared that if the grantor should fail to make payment of the sums that should be due by the personal obligation contained in the . . . bond and disposition in security within three months after a demand of payment intimated to the grantor . . . in or as nearly as may be in the form of No. 2 of Schedule FF hereto annexed—[Schedule of intimation, requisition, and protest]— . . . then and in that case it should be lawful to and in the power of the grantee immediately after the expiration of the said three months, and without any other intimation or process at law, to sell and dispose . . . of the . . . lands.”

with such further sum of interest as should accrue on the said principal sum till paid, but he has failed to do so, and the present action has been rendered necessary to enforce the pursuers' rights to the rents of the subjects disposed in security under the said bond. The averments stated in defence are denied. Prior to the statutory demand above mentioned being served upon him, the appearing defender intimated to the pursuers' agents that he was quite unable to make payment of the sum due under the said bond." June 4, 1913.
Anderson.

In answer the defender averred :—(Ans. 5) "Admitted that pursuers have, on 11th February 1913, served schedules of intimation, requisition, and protest demanding repayment of said bond within three months from the said date, and that the present action has been served on 21st February 1913. Explained and averred that no demand for repayment of said bond or any part thereof was ever made by pursuers before serving said schedules. Quoad ultra denied, and explained and averred that all interest due and payable on said bond has been paid and discharged without reservation."

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) The defender the said John Anderson not having paid to the pursuers the sums due by him to them as condescended on, the pursuers are entitled in virtue of the bond and disposition in security held by them to obtain decree of mails and duties as craved, with expenses.

The defender pleaded ;—(1) The action is irrelevant and incompetent and should be dismissed, with expenses. (2) The pursuers' statements are insufficient to support the conclusions of the action, which should be dismissed, with expenses. (3) The defender not being in default of payment of principal or interest to pursuers the action should be dismissed, with expenses.

On 20th March 1913 the Sheriff-substitute (Lee) sustained the first and third pleas in law for the defender, and dismissed the action as incompetent and unnecessary.

The pursuers appealed to the Sheriff (Millar), who, on 14th April 1913, adhered to the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute.

The pursuers appealed to the Court of Session, and the case was heard before the Second Division on 21st and 22nd May 1913.

Argued for the appellants ;—The action of mails and duties was competent. Admittedly before the action was brought it was necessary that there should have been a demand for payment followed by "default in payment."¹ Default meant failure to pay either principal or interest.² In the present case formal demand for payment was made when a schedule of intimation was sent to the defender stating that "payment is now required" of the sum due under the bond. There was also an averment, which should be remitted to probation, to the effect that the defender had been frequently called upon to pay. There was no statutory method of demand, and it could be made informally.³ Although three months' premonition must be given to the debtor before the power of sale could be put into operation, there was no specified period which must elapse after a demand for payment, and before the creditor could enter into possession of the security subjects. creditor, who intended to enforce his power of sale, was not thereby precluded from taking in addition his alternative remedies, either by a charge under the personal obligation in the bond or by bringing an action of mails and duties.¹ Whether the action was necessary was another matter which might have a bearing on the question of expenses, but could not affect that of competency.

Argued for the respondent;—The action was incompetent because there was no "default in payment" within the meaning of section 119 of the Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868, which provided that default in payment was a condition precedent of the creditor's right to enter into possession. There could be no question as to the interest, for that had always been punctually paid at the terms when it was due. As to the principal, all that the creditors had done (the averment as to other demands being too vague to be remitted to probation) was to serve upon the defender a notice which, read fairly and as a whole, was a demand for payment only on the expiry of three months. This intimation was appropriate only with reference to the power of sale, and was not meant to be, and should not be held to be, a demand for instant payment such as could put the defender in default if he did not make payment forthwith. The pursuers could have made a demand for immediate payment, but they had not done so, and therefore the defender was not in default at the date when the action was brought.

LORD DUNDAS.—[After narrating the facts]—It is not averred that the interest due at Martinmas 1912 was not duly paid, or that the defender's estates had or have been sequestrated, or that he was vergens ad inopiam. The defender in these circumstances pleads that the action is incompetent and irrelevant. The Sheriff-substitute sustained these pleas and the Sheriff adhered.

I am unable to agree with the conclusion at which the learned Sheriffs have arrived. It seems to be settled law that a creditor in a bond and disposition in security is entitled either to record the bond, in virtue of the clause consenting to registration thereof for execution, and charge the debtor thereon upon the personal obligation contained in the bond, and make him notour bankrupt, if payment is not made before expiry of the days of charge; or to call up the bond by service of the statutory schedule, and failing payment within three months thereafter, to sell the security subjects; and that, although the latter procedure has been instituted, the former may competently be resorted to during the currency of the three months—*M'Whirter*² and M'Nab.³ In M'Whirter's case² Lord President Inglis observed: "The bond gives two remedies—the first, that of charging upon the personal obligation; the second, that of calling up the bond, and failing payment within three months, of proceeding to a sale of the security subjects. It cannot be doubted that the respondents were entitled to both remedies." The present pursuers did not resort to their remedy upon the personal obligation. They brought this action of mails and duties, and seek to impound the rents for immediate satisfaction of principal and interest, as above explained, on the ground that default in payment has occurred. Their object seems to be to get control of the management of the security subjects, which are already under a decree of mails and duties obtained on 7th January 1913 at the instance of postponed bondholders. The pursuers' right is undoubtedly preferable to that of the postponed bondholders; and they may have a substantial interest to enforce it. The clause in the bond, "I assign the rents," is defined by section 119 of the Act, as, inter alia, entitling the creditor "on default in payment" to enter into possession of the subjects and uplift the rents. The clause "and on default in payment I grant power of sale" and the immediately preceding clauses are defined by the said section as having the same import as if the bond had specially provided that the subjects should be redeemable at the term and place of payment, or at any term of Whitsunday or Martinmas thereafter, "upon premonition of three months." It is a condition precedent of the exercise by the creditor of his right either to enter into possession or to sell that there should be default in payment. In the case of sale the right can only be exercised after the expiry of three months after premonition. There is no similar provision as regards entering into possession. The pursuers' counsel argued that the first portion of the schedules of notice served by them on the defender contained a clear demand for immediate payment of the principal sum in the bond, and interest to the date of demand; that the further notice given by the schedules about sale after three months was immaterial to impair their validity as a sufficient preliminary demand for immediate payment; and that, from and after service of the schedules, the defender was in default in payment, until payment was made. I think the pursuers' argument is in the main correct. The Sheriffs' view, in holding the action to be incompetent, seems to be that the debtor was not in default in payment at the date of the action, because no explicit demand for immediate payment had previously been made. The only written notice the defender had received was one in the well-known statutory form which in practice, and in conformity with the intention of the Act, is used when a creditor desires to intimate that, in the event of non-payment within the stated period of three months, he will (or may) proceed to sell the subjects. I have considerable sympathy with the view that the defender was reasonably entitled to read the schedule as a whole, and in its ordinarily accepted sense, as importing that the pursuers would (or might), after the expiry of the three months indicated, proceed to a sale; and that he might not understand it as a demand for immediate payment, to be followed in a few days by an action of mails and duties. But that does not seem to me to be a sufficient reason for holding the action to be incompetent. It would rather point to care being taken by the Court to avoid anything like oppression resulting from a justifiable misapprehension by the debtor of the force and meaning of the notice he had received, and to a reasonable amount of time being allowed to him before decree was pronounced. I am unable to affirm that the notice was not in law a demand for immediate payment and that the defender was not, after its receipt, in default in payment of the principal and any interest due thereon, as he would have been if he had been certiorated by a charge or other unmistak-

We ought, in my judgment, to recall the interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff, and remit the case to the Court below with instructions to the Sheriff-substitute that it must proceed. It will be for him to consider, when the case comes before him, whether in the circumstances, as they then stand, there is any reason for granting an extension of time before decree is pronounced, and to proceed in the matter as may be just.

M'Ara v.
Anderson.
Lord Dundas.

LORD SALVESEN.—With every desire to reach the same conclusion as that at which the Sheriffs arrived, I find myself unable to do so; and I agree in the opinion which has been delivered. After all, the point is mainly of academic interest, because it is conceded that if a written notice had been given by letter that payment was demanded within a reasonable time, or it may be immediately, there could have been no answer to the action; and a period of ten days elapsed between the time that the schedule was served and the raising of the action. When one keeps that in view and also the law which entitles a heritable creditor to record his bond and to give a six days' charge upon it, although the interest may not be in arrears, and so to enforce payment of the bond, I do not think it is introducing any additional hardship into the debtor's position that this action should be held competent.

But taking the case from the strict legal point of view, I think the debtor here was in default when, after having received the schedule of intimation, he did not make payment of the principal sum and interest of which he was thereby notified that the creditor required payment. I agree with what Lord Dundas has said that there may be circumstances in which the Court will protect a debtor from anything savouring of oppression, but that is a matter for the inferior Court to decide: it was not a point on which we were asked to pronounce.

LORD GUTHRIE.—The pursuers are only entitled to raise this action of mails and duties if, in terms of section 119 of the Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868, there has been on the part of the defender "default in payment" of the principal or of the interest due under the bond named in the summons. There has been no default in payment of interest; but the pursuers, founding on schedules of intimation, requisition, and protest served on the defender by them in the form given in Schedule FF (No. 2) of the Act, allege that the defender was at the date of the summons in default of payment of the principal sum due under the bond. It is said that the pursuers had a simple and direct way of making a demand for payment in which they would have intimated that, if payment was not made within a certain short space of time, other proceedings would follow. Instead of taking this course, to which it is admitted there would have been no answer, they chose to make their intimation in accordance with the above schedule, that is to say a form which was designed not as a preliminary to an action of mails and duties, but as a preliminary to a sale of the heritable subjects. This course has resulted in the defender's plausible defence. I was at first inclined to think that the course taken by the pursuers had not resulted in the circumstances in producing default in payment, June 4, 1913. and to concur in the view expressed by the Sheriff when he says,—“All that was done was the serving of the schedule, which is the ordinary first step in the process for realising the property, and he [the defender Anderson] had no notice of any intention of taking the present proceedings, as he had paid up the interest to the present time, and it is not averred that he has been sequestrated or is vergens ad inopiam.” But I have come to think with Lord Dundas, subject to the suggestion contained in the last sentence of his opinion, that if all that is needed is default of payment on the part of the defender, such default is sufficiently created by a failure to make payment upon any demand made by the pursuers on him in clear terms, and that such demand is contained in the schedule of intimation, requisition, and protest in question.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have had an opportunity of reading the opinion of Lord Dundas, with which I entirely concur.

Fann v.
M'Donald.

Succession—Legitim—Extent of legitim fund—Unrevoked donation inter virum et uxorem—Husband and Wife.

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Dewar, diss. Lord Dundas) that an unrevoked inter vivos gift of moveables made bona fide by a husband to his wife was subject to a claim for legitim, in respect that such claim could only be excluded by a gift which was absolute and irrevocable, whereas the gift in question was revocable as a donatio inter virum et uxorem.

ON 18th December 1912 Mrs Catherine M'Donald or Fann brought an action of count, reckoning, and payment against her stepmother, Mrs Margaret Nicolson or M'Donald, widow of the deceased John M'Donald, and against David Munro and Archibald Macdonald, his executors nominate. The summons concluded for an accounting and for payment of the amount of legitim due to the pursuer.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Dewar.

The pursuer averred that she and her brother, who was not a party to the action, were the children of John M'Donald, who died in 1910, leaving a settlement by which he bequeathed his whole means to the defender, Mrs M'Donald, who was his second wife, and appointed David Munro and Archibald Macdonald as executors. (Cond. 1) “ . . . There was no estate whatever standing in the name of the deceased at his death except his furniture, which the female defender has taken possession of. . . .” (Cond. 2) “During the marriage between the female defender and the said John M'Donald the latter transferred large sums of money to the former by handing the same to her to deposit in bank or elsewhere in her own name, or by deposit-ing the same at his own hand in her name. The following sums were so transferred:—In the latter part of 1905 he handed her £100 or thereby, which she at his desire deposited in bank in her own name; in September 1905, at Broadford, in Skye, he paid her £50, which by his direction she deposited in her own name; in April 1906, also at Broadford, he deposited the contents of a bank draft for £200 in bank in her own name, but afterwards transferred the money to the Clyde Trust; in December 1906 he deposited £700 in bank in her name; on 16th November 1907 he directed his banker to transfer to her name a deposit for £70 then standing in his own name, and the banker did so; in 1908 he again took a bank draft for £200 to bank and deposited the contents in her name. All these deposits still stood in her name at the death of the said John M'Donald in the form in which he had directed them to be made. The defender during the lifetime of the deceased John M'Donald did no act of ownership in regard to said deposits and investments, the same, although in her name, being really the property of her husband, who collected the revenue and directed the investment thereof. It is believed that he similarly placed in her name other sums of money to the amount of about £200, which she also put in her own name, and which remained there at his death. . . .” (Cond. 3) “The female defender maintains that the deceased gifted the said sums of money to her inter vivos. The pursuer, on the other hand, claims that they were invested in her name as a trust for the deceased, or alternatively, were a donation mortis causa. The revenue of the said sums of money which had been transferred as aforesaid was accumulated during the lifetime of the deceased and falls to be accounted for. The amount of the said funds at the death of John M'Donald was about £1850.” (Cond. 4) “The pursuer has called on the female defender to account to her for legitim, but she maintains that there is no estate available. The pursuer claims that the said funds should bear legitim whether they were a donation inter vivos or mortis causa or a trust for deceased. The deceased placed the property in question in his wife's name in order to defraud the pursuer and her brother (who had done nothing to offend him) of legitim, and this object was instigated by the defender. The alienation in favour of the defender was a device in order that he might disappoint his children's legal rights and was so treated by the deceased and the defender.”

Defences were lodged for Mrs M'Donald who admitted that sums, amounting to £1436, had been transferred to her by her husband during his lifetime, substantially in the manner averred by the pursuer. She averred:—(Ans. 2) “. . . From the respective dates when they were gifted to her she dealt with them entirely as her own property, collected the revenue derived from them, and paid it into her own bank account.”

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer being entitled to legitim out of the funds condescended on, and the same being in possession of the female defender as universal legatory or donee, the latter should be ordained to account therefor as craved.

The compearing defender pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The averments of the pursuer are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the action.

On 4th March 1913 the Lord Ordinary (Dewar) pronounced this interlocutor:—“Sustains the first plea in law for the pursuer: Repels the . . . third plea in law for the defender: Finds that the pursuer is entitled to legitim out of the funds transferred by her father, the late John M'Donald, to the defender, and that the defender must account to the pursuer therefor: Appoints the cause to be enrolled for further procedure, and grants leave to reclaim." * June 11, 1913.

Fann v.
M'Donald.

* "OPINION.—The question in this case is whether a father can defeat his children's claim to legitim by making over his whole property to his wife during the marriage. The pursuer is the daughter of the late John M'Donald, Broadford, Skye, and she brings this action against Mrs Margaret Nicolson or M'Donald, her stepmother, concluding for £400 in name of legitim. The pursuer's father married the defender on 15th July 1905, when he was about seventy years of age, and he died on 7th January 1910. He left a trust-disposition and settlement, but it is admitted that there was no estate standing in his name at the date of his death. It was all made over to the defender during the marriage. She admits that on various dates between May 1905 and November 1907 she received as gifts from her husband sums amounting in all to £1436. The money was sometimes handed over and deposited by her in bank in her own name, and at other times the deceased directed his bankers to transfer the money which stood in his name to the name of the defender. In this way he disposed of all he had, and it stood in the defender's name at his death. The pursuer avers that this was done at the defender's instigation to defeat her claim and her brother's claim to legitim, and that, although the said funds stood in the defender's name, they were truly the property of the deceased who directed the investment thereof and collected the revenue, and must, therefore, be regarded as having been held in trust for the deceased, or alternatively were a donation mortis causa. And further, and in any event, if they were, as the defender claims, donations inter vivos, they still must bear legitim on the ground that they were donations inter virum et uxorem, liable to be revoked at any time during the deceased's life; that the gift did not become absolute until his death, when legitim had fully vested in the pursuer.

"I do not think that it is necessary to inquire whether it was truly a trust or donation mortis causa, because I am of opinion that it must bear legitim even if it be, as the defender contends, a donation inter vivos.

"The right of legitim belongs to the children independently of the father, but it is settled that the father may so dispose of his property during life as to defeat his children's claims. He may, for example, give away his money, or deliver securities transmissible by delivery, or by deed inter vivos, provided the deed of alienation or gift be absolute and irrevocable. But he is not entitled to defeat legitim by any scheme or device having merely the appearance of disposing of his means and estate inter vivos, but in reality not doing so until after his death. Thus if a conveyance though ex facie absolute and irrevocable is of such a nature that the disponent has yet power over it, legitim is not barred. The test appears to be whether the donor has absolutely and irrevocably divested himself of his estate. If he has, the claim for legitim will be defeated, but not otherwise—(Craigie v. Craigie, (1811) Hume, 288; Black v. Black, (1795) Hume, 290; Buchanan v. Buchanan, (1876) 3 R. 556).

"If I am right in this, I think it follows that a gift from one spouse to another, being revocable at any time during the lifetime of the donor without the knowledge of the donee, does not fulfil the condition which is essential to defeat the claim of legitim. It appears to be in the same position as a donation mortis causa in a question of legitim, and it is settled that although a mortis causa deed may in express terms bar legitim it will be unavailing because the legitim has vested in the child at the same moment as the deed comes into operation. In the present case the gift to the defender did not become absolute till the donor's death, and at that period the legitim had fully vested in the pursuer. . . . On the whole matter I am of June 11, 1913. The defender reclaimed, and the case was heard before the Second Division on 16th and 20th May 1913.

Fann v.
M'Donald.

Argued for the claimer;—The question whether an unrevoked donation by a husband to his wife was subject to a claim for legitim was novel. The point was raised, but not decided, in Balmain v. Graham.¹ The question should be answered in the negative. Legitim could be claimed "only out of the moveable property belonging to the father at his death."² The subject of a gift which he might have revoked but did not—since a general settlement did not operate revocation³—was not "property belonging" to him at his death.⁴ The wife was not in the position of a trustee. She could deal with the property in any way she pleased, even contrary to her husband's wishes,⁴ and if he revoked the gift, she was not bound to restore what she had bona fide consumed.⁵ His estate being solvent, his creditors did not possess the power of revocation which they would otherwise have had.⁶ The gift took effect from the date on which it was made, subject only to a resolutive condition in the event of revocation,⁷ and accordingly from that date the donor was completely divested.⁸ The nature and effect of a donation inter vivos between spouses became clear by contrasting it with a donation mortis causa, which only took effect on and as from the death of the donor.⁹ The institutional writers in saying that a father's deed must be "irrevocable" in order to defeat the right to legitim¹⁰ had in contemplation another case, namely, the case of a simulate transaction where the father did not in reality part with control of the property. In such a case the claim to legitim was no doubt unaffected,¹¹ and this was the ratio of the decisions relied on by the Lord Ordinary.¹² These authorities had no application to a case where the father had divested himself as completely as it was in his power to do. If he had expressly reserved the power to revoke, that might have prevented divestiture as indicating an intention to retain the control of the fund. But the same result did not follow from the mere existence of a power of revocation conferred on him by force of law. The averment that the gift was made "to defraud" the children of their legitim was wholly irrelevant.¹ The case of Lord Advocate v. Gunning's Trustees,² cited by the respondent, had no application. That case decided that the subject of a gift by a husband to his wife was property of which he was "competent to dispose" in the sense of the Finance Act, which was merely equivalent to saying that he had a power of revocation. It threw no light on the situation which arose if that power were not exercised.

Argued for the respondent;—The law was clearly laid down by the institutional writers to the effect that a claim of legitim could only be defeated by an irrevocable alienation of the property.³ A donatio inter virum et uxorem was revocable, and therefore legitim was payable out of the subject of the gift. The rights of the donee in this property could not be "established until the death of the donor, for until then they were liable to be avoided by a revocation."⁴ It followed that the property belonged to the donor at his death.⁵ Further, the husband's settlement was an implied revocation of the gift, for it dealt with his "whole means." The argument for the respondent was fully stated in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary.

At advising on 11th June 1913,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question to be decided in this case is whether a donation made by a husband to his wife stante matrimonio, and which he has taken no steps to recall during his life, does, at his death, form part of the fund on which the children have a claim for a share as legitim, it being undoubted that the right to revoke was in the husband until the time of his death, such a right being implied in law. This question the Lord Ordinary has answered in the affirmative. Giving the best attention I can to the matter, and the more so as I understand there is a difference of opinion among your Lordships, I have come to be of opinion that the judgment is right and ought to be affirmed. It appears to me that the true criterion in such a case is expressed by Lord Justice-Clerk Boyle in the case of Nicolson's Assignee,⁶ where he says that "if we are satisfied that power over the estate is still retained . . . the claim of legitim will be sustained." It seems to me that the passages quoted to the Court at the debate from the institutional writers bear out the pursuer's contention, that where a donation is not so given as to be irrevocable, and nothing is done during the granter's life to stamp it as irrevocable, the fact that the donor could have revoked it at any time during his life, places the subject of the donation under liability for his obligations after his death. It forms part of the fund liable to meet his debts, and legitim being a debt in law due by his estate, the claim of those entitled to legitim must be satisfied from it if it is necessary, in whole or in part, to meet the claim. At the moment of the husband's death it is true that he can no longer exercise his right of revocation, but equally at

June 11, 1913. that moment the legitim claim emerges. And the legitim claim being a claim for a debt, it cannot be ousted by what was a revocable gift, which Fann v. M'Donald. was not made absolute while the maker of the gift otherwise revocable was alive.

Lord Justice-Clerk.

I do not consider it necessary to go at length into the authorities and cases which were quoted at the debate. I have had an opportunity of considering an opinion which has been prepared by Lord Salvesen, in which he has gone most fully into the matter. And concurring as I do in the result at which he has arrived, and in the grounds he gives for his decision, I content myself with expressing that concurrence, and would therefore move your Lordships to adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD DUNDAS.—The question we have here to decide is, as conditioned by the argument, whether moveable property the subject of a gift (or series of gifts) made by a husband to his wife some years before his death, and with which she has ever since dealt as her own property, must be reckoned as part of the husband's moveable estate at his death for the purpose of computing legitim, on the sole ground that donations inter virum et uxorem are by law revocable. The Lord Ordinary has decided in the affirmative. He considers that the gift, in order to be good against a claim for legitim, must be absolute and irrevocable in the sense that the donor must not only have divested himself of the subject absolutely but must also have placed it beyond his power to recall; and that, inasmuch as a donation inter sponsores is by law revocable by the donor during lifetime, it necessarily fails to satisfy this essential test or condition. The reasoning is plausible; but at the conclusion of the debate I had formed an impression that it was unsound, and I thought (and think) that the Lord Ordinary is palpably in error when he adds—what enters deeply into the problem—that such a gift is “in the same position as a donation mortis causa in a question of legitim.” I have had an opportunity of studying the much fuller and more elaborate opinion written by my brother Lord Salvesen, with which I understand your Lordships agree, and which reaches the same conclusion as the Lord Ordinary upon substantially the same grounds. Having given the best consideration I can to the matter, I find myself unable to agree with your Lordships and the Lord Ordinary. It appears to me that a gift under the conditions postulated, being ab initio not void but merely voidable, is a valid alienation pro tanto of the donor's moveable estate as from its date, provided that the resolute condition inherent by law in its nature has not come into operation.

One must consider somewhat closely the legal nature and quality of a claim for legitim on the one hand, and of a donatio inter sponsores on the other. Legitim, the legitima pars liberorum, may, I take it, with sufficient accuracy be described as the share of the deceased's personal estate to which his surviving children are by law entitled on his death. Their claim emerges only on the father's death. It is a claim, not against the living father, but against his executors for a share of the executory estate, and cannot extend to anything not comprehended within that estate. I do not see how the subject of such a gift as we are here discussing can be in bonis defuncti, part of the executory estate of the deceased husband and father. The case of *Gunning's Trustees*¹ was founded on as supporting the affirmative of that June 11, 1913. contention. It seems to me to have no bearing in that direction. It Fann v. decided that the Crown was entitled to estate-duty upon a sum of money M'Donald. which the deceased had gifted to his wife, and had never recalled. The Lord Dundas. decision was reached on the ground that it was "property of which the deceased was at the time of his death competent to dispose" within the meaning of section 2 (1) (a) of the Finance Act, 1894, as the words quoted are defined by section 22 (2) (a) thereof. To put it otherwise, the donor was entitled to revoke; therefore it was within his competency to dispose of the money by revocation. But that is very different from affirming that the gift unrevoked did form part of his executory estate. The two things seem to me to have no true relation to one another. Thus, by another sub-head of the same section of the Finance Act (section 2 (1) (c)), duty is claimable upon gifts made inter vivos by the deceased, if within twelve months of his death; yet it could never be maintained that these formed part of his executory estate. It is not hujus loci to consider whether or not the Crown may have a claim for duty in this case, or against whom; but I think one may discard *Gunning's Trustees*¹ as an authority in point for the present discussion. Now, it seems to me that a claim by this pursuer against her father's executors for payment of a share of the moneys gifted by him to his wife would have been completely met by the executors with the defence that the moneys sued for were neither in their possession nor under their control. The executors could not, so far as I see, have successfully sued the wife for recovery of the moneys; for a trust-settlement in general terms does not revoke a donation inter virum et uxorem.² *Thomson's case*³ is worth notice as being, so far as I know, the only direct authority on the point before us. The question was raised in that case not (as here) by a child claiming legitim, but by testamentary trustees claiming the subject of the wife's gift, as forming part of the deceased husband's general estate. The Court repelled the claim on the ground that the gift, not having been recalled, could not be held to be part of the husband's estate at his death. If the decision was sound (and I see no reason to doubt it) it is clear that a claim to a part of the subject in name of legitim must have been refused on the same ground, viz., that the subject gifted was not in bonis of the father at his death. Such a donation, as already said, is by our law not void, but only voidable; it is a valid gift, subject only to a resolutive condition.⁴ In the present case the condition cannot now come into operation; for the husband did not revoke the gifts, and there is no suggestion that there is any creditor in a position to do so. I think, therefore, that the gifts were valid alienations of his moveable estate, vesting in the donee at their respective dates, subject only to a possible defeat which cannot now take place; and that they cannot be held as forming part of the donor's executory estate in this question of legitim.

June 11, 1913. A gift of this sort does not constitute a trust for the donor in the person of the donee: it is something very different; at the moment of gift, the husband is divested and the wife vested, not in the mere title, but in the beneficial right of ownership. The gift is, indeed, subject to the risk of recall; but unless and until that event shall happen, her right of ownership is as full and complete as that of any other donee; and on the husband's death the gift holds good as against the executors under his general settlement. It is equally clear that such a gift does not stand in pari casu with a mere testamentary bequest; for if the wife should predecease the husband, and he thereafter die leaving the gift unrecalled, the gift, having vested in her as at its date, would pass to her own executors or representatives as part of her estate.¹ Nor is it, I respectfully think, a tenable view—though it seems to commend itself to the Lord Ordinary and to your Lordships—that a gift inter sponsos, such as we are here considering, is in the same position as a donation mortis causa. In the latter case, “the property is immediately transferred to the grantee, upon the condition that he shall hold for the granter so long as he lives, subject to his power of revocation, and, failing such revocation, then for the grantee on the death of the granter. It is involved of course in this definition, that if the grantee predecease the granter the property reverts to the granter, and the qualified right of property which was vested in the grantee is extinguished by his predecease.”² I have already referred to sufficient authority to show that a gift inter sponsos is not held in trust for the donor, and that, if the donee predeceases, the gift still remains good, and will pass to her own executors or representatives, if not subsequently recalled by the donor. It vests in the donee ab initio, subject only to a risk of defeat.

It was, however, strongly maintained that, inasmuch as donations inter sponsos are by law revocable, and the donor cannot effectively discharge his or her right to revoke, they fall short of what the Lord Ordinary calls the “test” or “essential condition” necessary to defeat a claim of legitim, viz., the absolute and irrevocable divestiture of the property by the donor. Lord Salvesen observes that the defender's counsel put himself out of Court by conceding “that where a gift has been made in favour of a third party by a deed which expressly reserved the granter's power to revoke it at any time, the gift would not be effectual to bar legitim.” I did not recollect, and have not noted, that such a concession was made; but if it was, I should not be prepared to hold a party litigant as bound by a concession in law made by counsel in the course of a somewhat perfunctory debate, if, as I consider to be the case, the legal point conceded was erroneous. The element of irrevocability is no doubt important in all questions of gift or alienation; and it is dealt with by the text-writers and by the Judges in discussing gifts to third parties. But one must be careful to read any particular passage in the light of the decisions cited as supporting it, and any dictum along with its full context; and I do not think that, if that is done, there will be found either authority or decision for the proposition that a

 it was not irrevocable. I believe that all the cases where the claim was ^{Fann v.} allowed were decided on the ground that the alienation founded on was truly ^{M'Donald.}
 of a testamentary character; i.e., not merely revocable, but also intended to ^{Lord Dundas.} be prestable, and taking effect, only after the granter's death. There are some cases where the deed or transaction under review has been set aside or disregarded as being "simulate"—by which I apprehend, is meant a transaction ex facie and in form duly completed inter vivos, but in truth and substance not taking, or intended to take, effect during life. A recent type of this class of case is Buchanan.¹ In the case before us, however, upon the postulates of the argument, there is no "simulate" transaction or alienation, for ex hypothesi the donee dealt with the subjects of gift throughout as her own property. Reverting now to the institutional and text writers, Mr Erskine,² under the title "Of Succession in Moveables," observes that "the husband, though he should be in liege pousie, cannot dispose of his move-ables to the prejudice of the jus relictæ, or right of legitim, by way of testament, or indeed by any revocable deed; for revocable grants create no debt till the death of the granter, and at that period the right of the society goods is fully vested in the widow and children." I think the words which I have italicised can mean no more than that a claim for legitim is not to be defeated by any revocable deed which does not take effect until after the death of the granter; for the only case cited by Mr Erskine³ was clearly of that nature, as appears from the report in Morison. Lord Fraser, writing more than a hundred years later than Erskine, says, under the head of "Legitim,"⁴ that a father's deed or gift, in order to effectually defeat a claim for legitim, must be (1) absolute and irrevocable, (2) inter vivos, and not mortis causa. In considering the first of these propositions one must not lose sight of, nor entirely disjoin it from, the second. Under the heading that "the father's deed must be irrevocable," the learned author, after citing the passage in Erskine I have just referred to, discusses a series of cases. The first is the well-known case of Lashley v. Hog.⁵ The subject of controversy there was certain bank shares, part of which the father had ostensibly given to his son, while continuing to draw the dividends, &c., himself, and another part of which he had ostensibly given to the son, while in fact the latter held them upon an agreement or understanding that he would invest the same in land to be entailed after the father's death. The House of Lords held, in regard to both classes of shares, that a claim for legitim was not excluded; in regard to the former class, upon the ground, as I gather from the report, that the fact of the father having continued to receive the dividends, &c., was sufficient to warrant the legal inference that he had never ceased to be the true beneficial owner, in other words, that there was truly no gift at all to the son; and as to the latter class, that, in respect of the understanding between father and son as to the application of the shares after the father's death, there was no true gift to the son, who was to be merely the instrument for carrying out his father's testamentary intentions. I do not think *Lashley v. Hog*⁵ touches the present question;

June 11, 1913. for, on the assumption postulated by the argument, there was here a bona fide gift (or series of gifts) of which the donee thereafter received the interest as her own property, without any understanding or restriction as to the ultimate disposal of principal or interest. Lord Fraser next cites the important case of Nicolson's Assignee.¹ But the decision in that case, so far as it supported the claim for legitim, proceeded, I think, plainly upon the ground that the deed under consideration was of a testamentary character. The counter pleas on the point were as follows. The defenders pleaded that the granter "had irrevocably" (the deed bore ex facie to be irrevocable) "by a proper and rational deed conveyed away his property inter vivos, reserving only to himself an annuity." The pursuer pleaded that "the claim of legitim was in no way cut off or affected by the execution of the deed in favour of the defenders, in respect it was of a testamentary and mortis causa nature, and, in so far as it had reference to the testator's lifetime, was, for his own behoof, gratuitous, and revocable." The Lord Ordinary (Moncreiff), in making avizandum to the Court, pointed out that the deed consisted of two parts; one for payment of debts and a life annuity to the granter; "the other is a universal settlement, mortis causa, for the disposal of his property at his death." Lord Moncreiff went on to say, "The question here is, whether Mr Macalister's whole personal estate in possession, or still to be realised, was so completely alienated by the trust-deed, that after all the existing debts were paid nothing remained in his own person, and all was vested in gratuitous legatees, to whom no right was given till his death. And the more particular question is, whether the right of legitim, existing during his life, though not coming into operation as a debt till his death, could be defeated by such a gratuitous trust. The Lord Ordinary doubts much whether any mere trust, which substantially was for the trustor's own benefit after the payment of debts, could have this effect. He has as yet seen no example of its being so held. A man may, indeed, injure or impair the right of legitim by bona fide converting personal funds into heritable estate, or bona fide giving away or spending his money in his lifetime; but it is a very different thing to make a universal settlement of his whole property mortis causa, by the mere interposition of trustees to act as his executors at his death. Supposing such a deed to be effectual for its purposes otherwise, it is thought that it cannot prejudice the right of legitim competent to the children." The Court, agreeing with these views, held the first purpose of the deed to be a proper alienation inter vivos, but were of opinion that the ulterior purposes were testamentary, and therefore ineffectual to exclude the claim of legitim.² I need not notice in detail the other cases referred to or commented on by Lord Fraser. They include Buchanan.³ In each and all, the point seems to have been that a deed or gift which is in substance of a revocable nature (whether declared to be irrevocable or not), in the sense that it was not truly intended by the granter to take effect during his life, will not defeat legitim. The same observation is, I think, true of the cases (which are mainly those referred to by Lord Fraser) cited by Professor Bell in support of his statement¹ that legitim may be defeated June 11, 1913. by an "irrevocable deed inter vivos, though the term of payment is after ^{Fann v.} the husband's death, and although a life rent or any annuity is reserved; ^{M'Donald.} but not by a deed mortis causa, or by one which does not absolutely divest ^{Lord Dundas.} the father." The absolute divestiture desiderated is a bona fide alienation inter vivos, not one where the beneficial right is to take effect only after the grantor's death. In this sense again I think one must read Lord M'Laren's statement,² based on the same (or similar) cases as those referred to by the other text-writers, that "the legitim fund is therefore effectually diminished by deeds of alienation or conversion executed inter vivos and in liege poustie, provided they are absolute and irrevocable, and are not intended as a mere device for diminishing the children's legal provisions." It seems to me, therefore, that revocability, or the reverse, has never been made per se the test or essential condition of the validity or otherwise of a gift or alienation inter vivos to diminish or extinguish the legitim fund. I am not aware of any case where a gift has been made of moveable property (e.g., a yacht, a family jewel, or even of stock or investments) to a third party, the donee having thereafter exclusive use and enjoyment of it, but upon an express condition that the grantor should be entitled at any time during his life to recall the gift. Such a case would form a close analogue of the kind of donation inter vivos we are here considering. It appears to me that, upon principle, the gift (in the case I have supposed) would, if not revoked, plainly be no part of the executry estate of the grantor; and that the same is true in the present case.

I have now stated the reasons which lead me to a conclusion opposite to that of the Lord Ordinary. I think (differing from your Lordships) that his interlocutor ought to be recalled. But the case would, in that event, have to go back to the Outer House for proof. The argument at our bar was necessarily conducted on the footing that, as averred by the defender, she dealt with the subjects of gift, from the respective dates of gift, entirely as her own property, collected the revenue derived from them, and paid it into her own bank account. This is denied by the pursuer, who avers that the defender during the lifetime of her husband did no act of ownership in regard to the deposits and investments, the same, although in her name, being really the property of her husband, who collected the revenue and directed the investment thereof. If the latter account of the matter were proved to be true, it might well be that the result of the case would be different from that which, upon the postulates of the argument before us, I think we ought, upon the legal question, to affirm.

LORD SALVESEN.—In this case I am so well satisfied with the reasons assigned by the Lord Ordinary for his judgment that I should not have been disposed to add anything, but for the fact that the precise circumstances in which the present claim is made have never formed the subject of express decision. This is somewhat strange, seeing that donations by a husband to a wife are of frequent occurrence and often remain unrevoked

June 11, 1913. at the death of the donor, and I can only account for there being no decision precisely in point on the footing that the principles that fall to be applied have been long settled.

Fann v.
M'Donald.

Lord Salvesen.

The defender's counsel conceded that according to the law of Scotland a donation by a husband to his wife (subject to certain exceptions with which we are not here concerned) is revocable at any moment, and may be revoked even by a mortis causa settlement. It follows that the subject of the donation is, up to the moment of the donor's death, under his control. If he dies bankrupt without having revoked, his creditors are entitled to claim the subject of the gift as part of his estate, and this even although sequestration is only taken out a considerable time after death. It follows, I think necessarily, that such a donation cannot operate an exclusion of the children's legitim from the subject of the gift, for they are entitled to claim legitim from all moveable estate which was in bonis of their father at the time of his death. The failure of the husband to revoke the donation only makes the gift absolute in favour of the donee as in a question with the husband's representatives, but legitim is a claim of debt and not a right of succession, and while it cannot even rank alongside of the claims of ordinary creditors it takes precedence of any testamentary provision in favour of third parties. It was argued that the right of revocation which is inherent in the donating husband, and of which he cannot deprive himself when it becomes absolute by his death without revoking, draws back to the date when the gift was made. I do not doubt it, but here the gift only became absolute subject to the right of creditors and to the children's right of legitim, which vested in them the moment the breath was out of the father's body.

I put one illustration which I think demonstrates that legitim cannot be excluded from the subject of a donation revocable during the father's life. Suppose that in this instance the deceased, instead of leaving his whole estate to his widow, had by his will directed that it should be conveyed to third parties, and expressly included in the conveyance the donations to his wife, I apprehend it could not have been contended for a moment that any part of his moveable estate would have been exempt from a claim of legitim. Can there be a different result because he leaves unrevoked the donations in favour of his wife? The legitim fund in each case must be precisely the same whoever may be the object of the testator's bounty.

It has been suggested that as the claim for legitim only arises on the father's death and is a claim against his executory estate it cannot be payable out of moveable property which has been made the subject of a donation inter vivos, which donation has become absolute on his death without revocation. Precisely the same thing might be said of a claim by the Government for succession-duty. Yet it was held in the case of the *Lord Advocate v. Gunning's Trustees*¹ that the estate upon which succession-duty fell to be paid included donations made by the testator to his wife stante matrimonio. The executor maintained there, as here, that as the testator had not revoked his gift the subject of it formed no part of his estate at the time of his death; but the Court held that it was still property of which the deceased was at the date of his death competent to dispose, and was therefore liable to duty. The test seems to me to be exactly the same June 11, 1913. in the case of legitim. I know of no case, and can conceive none, where ^{Fann v.} moveable property over which the testator had the full control during his ^{M'Donald.} life, and right to dispose of after his death, has been excluded from the ^{Lord Salvessen.} legitim fund. There may in certain circumstances be a difficulty in recovering the donations, and if these have been consumed by the donee who has no other funds, the legitim fund must suffer abatement in the same way as if the estate consisted partly of a debt which proved to be irrecoverable. Here there is no such difficulty, as the widow is the universal legatory of her husband's estate and is the leading defender in the present action. Moreover, no such plea has been stated on her behalf.

One other concession which the defender's counsel made seems to me to put him out of Court. He conceded that where a gift has been made in favour of a third party by a deed which expressly reserved the granter's power to revoke it at any time, the deed would not be effectual to bar legitim. I should certainly not hold a party bound by his counsel's concession in law if I believed it to be erroneous; but an examination of the authorities satisfies me that the concession was rightly made. All the text-writers seem agreed that while a father may defeat legitim by alienating his moveables onerously or gratuitously, the alienation must be such as to divest him completely of the property. Thus Fraser on Husband and Wife says, page 1001:—"1. The deed of alienation or of gift must be absolute and irrevocable. 2. It must be inter vivos, and not mortis causa." So again Bell in his Principles, section 1585, deals with the matter thus:—"Legitim may be defeated by an irrevocable deed inter vivos although the term of payment is after the husband's death and although a liferent or any annuity is reserved; but not by a deed mortis causa or by one which does not absolutely divest the father." It is true that in the original edition the word "irrevocable" does not appear, nor the last clause above quoted, but there is nothing in the original text inconsistent with these additions; and they have the authority of a distinguished lawyer. In M'Laren's Wills and Succession¹ the proposition is stated in different terms, but to the same effect:—"The legitim fund is therefore effectually diminished by deeds of alienation or conversion executed inter vivos and in liege poustie, provided they are absolute and irrevocable, and are not intended as a mere device for diminishing the children's legal provisions." In Erskine's Institutes the matter is dealt with precisely on the same lines. It would be remarkable if all the text-writers who deal with the subject should have misread the authorities on which their statement of the law is based. I have studied some of these for myself, and I think they have rightly apprehended their import. I shall cite only two or three as examples. In the case of *Nicolson's Assignee*² the question was whether estate settled by a gratuitous trust-deed for payment of debts and of a restricted liferent annuity to the granter and disposing otherwise of the fee of his property barred the children's claim to legitim; and it was held that it did not. The ground of decision was thus expressed by the Lord Ordinary, Lord Mon-

June 11, 1913. creiff,¹ a very weighty authority on a subject like this: "For it appears to him to be a very clear matter of law, that the truster was not by the trust-deed divested of his estate and funds to all effects whatever. That trust might have been superseded altogether, if the truster's condition and the state of his affairs were such as to admit of sequestration, or of a process of ranking and sale. . . . The question is, whether the truster was so divested that diligence directed against him would not have been effectual to attach the residue of the funds, not through the trustees, but directly through the truster himself, and such proceedings might have arisen in consequence of new debts by the truster, after the execution of the trust-deed." This decision was affirmed by the Second Division. Lord Justice-Clerk Boyle² in giving the leading opinion says: "But if there is the least indication on the face of the deed, that the divestiture is not total and absolute (for it may be such, that the granter has no power to attach the subjects conveyed, but is divested out and out), we must look at the deed to ascertain this; and if we are satisfied that power over the estate is still retained, then the other principle comes into play, and the claim of legitim will be sustained." I pause to observe that it is long settled that in the event of sequestration of a donor, whether during his lifetime or after his death, a donation to the bankrupt's wife would fall under the sequestration.

Again, in the case of Collie,³ the circumstances were that a party had lent a sum of money on a bond taken payable to trustees for behoof of his two grandsons reserving his own liferent right to the interest and the debtors had by his direction delivered the bond to his son-in-law, one of the trustees whom he desired to keep it till he should receive further notice. Interest was paid to the son-in-law both before and after the lender's death. Parole evidence was led which showed that it was the lender's intention that the deed should be irrevocable; and it was accordingly held that it was effectual to exclude a claim of legitim at the instance of a daughter. Apart from the parole proof, it is plain that all the circumstances indicated that the granter had completely divested himself of the fee by the deed in question. The beneficiaries were two of his grandchildren, his own liferent interest was reserved, and the deed was in possession of one of the trustees whom he had appointed to hold the estate. Nevertheless the Court thought it necessary to have parole evidence that there was no sort of understanding between him and the trustees that he should be reinvested in his property if he so desired. The whole reasoning of the Judges proceeded upon the view that the granter had been completely divested of his estate so far as it related to the fee of the subjects, and it is plain that they would have reached the opposite result if they thought it could have been revoked by him. Lord Medwyn said: "Considering the object and character of this bond, and the circumstances under which it was granted, I think it may be inferred that it was the intention of old Pirie to make it an irrevocable deed." And again: "There does not appear the slightest ground for supposing any change of intention as to this money, or that he wished to retain any power over it"; and Lord Moncreiff thus stated the case for the pursuer: "As I have understood the pleas maintained, the case appears to be June 11, 1913. rested on the ground that the deed was never delivered—that it continued Fann v. M'Donald. revocable till the death of Mr Pirie—and that it was therefore ineffectual as a deed inter vivos to divest the deceased of the funds in question, and so Lord Salvesen. ineffectual to impair the fund of legitim." The whole of that learned Judge's opinion is then directed to showing that in the particular circumstances of the case there had been an irrevocable donation of the fee to take full effect inter vivos in favour of the beneficiaries.

These cases appear to me to establish beyond question in the case of donations to third parties inter vivos that, if they are revocable during the grantor's life and do not completely divest him of his estate, they are ineffectual to exclude legitim. If so, I think it impossible to differentiate such a case from one where the right of revocation, although not expressly reserved, is implied by law. Suppose that the deposit-receipts which are here in question had been assigned by a writing which expressly reserved the husband's right of revocation, such a case would admittedly have been within the scope of previous decisions. How can it make any difference that the condition is not expressed but is implied by law? The donee must be assumed to know the law and to take the gift subject to the implied condition that the donor may at any time revoke it.

Can it then be said there is anything in the quality of an inter vivos gift between man and wife which differentiates it from other similar gifts? There may certainly be distinctions, but they are not favourable to the wife. Thus in Collie's case¹ the donation could not have been revoked by a testamentary act of the donor although ineffectual as in a question with his creditors; whereas it is certain that a donation to a wife may be revoked by will. The truth is that where the donee is a husband or wife the property donated is held on a highly precarious tenure. "The donee cannot . . . alienate the subject nor charge it with any burden to the prejudice of the donor, and consequently the donor returns, upon his revocation, to the full property of the subject, free from the consequences of all the intermediate deeds granted by the donee even to his creditors or singular successors."²

This passage probably refers primarily to a donation of heritable estate; and so far as the rights of third parties are concerned it probably falls to be qualified when the subject of the donation is money or moveables, as explained in Fraser on Husband and Wife, (2nd ed.) vol. ii, p. 960. As in a question with the donee, however, the rule holds good; and it may even be that the donee is accountable for the income of the subject gifted unless it has been consumed with the consent, express or implied, of the donor. Until the donor's death, therefore, the donee is a mere trustee for the donor, having the chance of becoming absolutely entitled to the gift in the event of the donor dying without revoking it. If the donor in his last settlement expressly confirmed a donation it would become absolute in virtue of a testamentary act; and it cannot be any better that the law implies such a confirmation where no inconsistent testamentary act can be founded on.

In short, in order that the donation inter vivos may be effectual to exclude legitim, it must, to use the language of Professor Bell, "be absolute and

² Ersk. Inst. i. 6, 32.

June 11, 1913. irrevocable"; and the gifts which are treated in this case are admittedly not in that position. On these grounds, I have no difficulty in reaching the same conclusion as the Lord Ordinary.

Fann v.
M'Donald.

LORD GUTHRIE.—The pursuer claims legitim out of certain sums, amounting, according to her, to £1850, and according to the defender to £1436, which, during the marriage of the pursuer's deceased father with the defender, the deceased's second wife, the pursuer's stepmother, formed the subject of donations from him to the defender. The pursuer has allegations on record to the effect that the so-called donations were simulate, and remained the absolute property of her father; and, alternatively, that they were truly held by the defender in trust for the deceased. The Lord Ordinary has decided the case on a ground which obviates consideration of these averments, because he has held that, even if, as alleged by the defender, the sums in question were bona fide inter vivos donations by the deceased to the defender, they are still liable to legitim in favour of the pursuer and her brother, being the only children of the deceased. The circumstances that the deceased at his death left no estate other than the sums in question, and that the defender is, under her husband's settlement, his universal legatory, obviously exclude any attempt to exclude claims of legitim either on the ground that the sums in question were presents, or that they constituted no more than a reasonable provision for a widow. The donations were unrevoked at the deceased's death, and no question arises with outside creditors. It is settled law that a general settlement like that, executed by the deceased, containing no indications of intention to affect the donations, cannot operate as a revocation.

The question at issue is whether bona fide inter vivos donations, made inter virum et uxorem without a deed, and unrevoked at the donor's death, exclude claims for legitim of the donor's surviving children. But I think the question may be stated more broadly, namely, if A gifts, whether inter vivos or mortis causa, personal estate to B, with a right of revocation reserved to A, whether express or implied in law, and dies without revoking, is the gift, in the hands of B or of B's representatives, liable to the legal claims of A's surviving spouse and children? There is no sound distinction between the case where a right of revocation is expressly stipulated and the present case where it is implied by law, or between the case where the gift is accompanied by a deed and where it is given without a deed, or between the claims of children and those of a surviving spouse.

The pursuer contends, and the Lord Ordinary affirms the proposition, that, by the law of Scotland, no donation of moveable estate, although bona fide and inter vivos, can exclude the legal claims of the donor's surviving children, unless it be originally, or have been made prior to the donor's death, irrevocable. The pursuer says that, apart from the claims of the Revenue and of outside creditors, a revocable donation of moveable estate can only take full effect in Scotland in favour of the donee, in the event of the donor leaving no surviving spouse, and no children, whose claims have not been discharged. In the case of a mortis causa donation, this result, admitted by the defender, is attributed by her to the fact that, in that case, the donor remains in full control of the donation till his death, at which date it is still in bonis. But the pursuer maintains that the same principle June 11, 1913.

 applies to the case of an inter vivos donation, which is subject to recall, Fann v.
 because, although, in the case of an inter vivos donation, the donor may part M'Donald.
 with the possession, he still retains control, although indirectly, being able Lord Guthrie.
 to recall it instantly and without reason assigned, if the donee is not dealing with it as he thinks proper.

It is scarcely disputed that, if the passages to which your Lordships have referred in the works of Erskine, Bell, Fraser, and M'Laren (and the corresponding passages in reference to ius relictæ) be read apart from the authorities to which they refer, the pursuer's contention must prevail. The passages say, in express terms, that, to exclude legitim claims, not only must a donation be bona fide and inter vivos, but it must also be irrevocable. It is no doubt true that there is no case referred to by these writers or subsequently decided which affirms the exact proposition now maintained by the pursuer, namely, that a bona fide inter vivos gift to a wife, unrevoked at the death of the donor, her husband, is liable to be affected by a legitim claim. It is also true that the cases hitherto decided turned directly not on revocability but either on whether the alleged donation was not truly simulate or on whether an alleged inter vivos donation was not truly mortis causa. But this does not seem to me to conclude the question, if the generality of the words (which must be assumed to have been carefully chosen) unambiguously covers the case we are now dealing with; unless, indeed, there be some clear reason for excluding it.

I do not find such a clear reason in the fact that legitim is only due to children, who survive the parent, out of whose estate legitim is claimed. It was argued that legitim cannot be claimed out of an unrevoked inter vivos donation, because, before the right to legitim has vested, the right of the donee has become irrevocable. But what truly happens at the death of the donor is that the donee's right to the donation as irrevocable and the children's right to legitim arise at the same moment; and the emergence of the right to legitim prevents the right to the donation becoming irrevocable, so far as the donation is required to satisfy the legitim claim. As Mr Erskine puts it,¹ "The husband cannot dispose of his moveables to the prejudice of the right of legitim by way of any revocable deed; for revocable grants create no debt till the death of the granter, and at that period the right of the society goods is fully vested in the widow and children."

Then it was said that, seeing that, on the death of the donor, the donation draws back to the original date of the gift, no right like legitim, which arises only on the death of the donor, can affect it. But this consideration (which obviously does not apply to the case of a sequestration after the death of a donor) loses all force, if I am right in thinking that the right to legitim prevents (to the extent above mentioned) the donation becoming irrevocable and so drawing back to its original date.

It was also maintained that legitim was excluded because, if the donation was bona fide inter vivos, and unrecalled at the donor's death, it was not in bonis of the deceased at his death. Now no doubt, in the ordinary case, if a subject is in bonis of a deceased, the executors are entitled and bound

June 11, 1913. to include it in the inventory, and they have a title to sue for it, if it is in the hands of a third party. In a case like the present the executors (supposing the estate had not been destined to the donee) could only have included in the inventory, or, at all events, could only have sued for, such part of the donation as was required to satisfy the legal claims of the surviving spouse and children, and to pay the revenue. But this does not seem to me to prevent the donation being in bonis of the deceased at the date of his death, so far as requisite to satisfy these claims. Equally, in the case of sequestration, the revocation which is affected either by the sequestration itself or by express recall by the trustee does not necessarily void the whole donation, for the trustee can only recover such a part as is necessary to render the estate under his charge solvent. I do not see why, if sequestration taken out after a donor's death, and after a donation whether inter vivos or mortis causa has therefore become irrevocable, operates as a partial recall of the donation, a claim like legitim should not operate to prevent the donation, so far as required to satisfy the legitim claim, from becoming irrevocable. I am, therefore, unable to adopt a view, which would, I think, read out one of the conditions laid down by the institutional writers in the case of donations as necessary to exclude claims of legitim, namely, irrevocability.

Like Lord Dundas, my opinion is not affected by the case of Gunning's Trustees.² The question in that case turned entirely on the construction of the Finance Act of 1894, section 2 (1) (a). Lord Kinnear put it thus:—"The question is whether certain pecuniary interests did or did not belong to the deceased in the sense of the statute." The clause of the statute was not declaratory of the common law but involved consideration of a special provision which provided a test different from that applicable to the present case. In that case the question was whether the deceased was competent to dispose of certain funds, a provision which may be wider or narrower in its scope, but is certainly not co-extensive with the question whether funds are, even if only for a special purpose, in bonis defuncti.

I am therefore of opinion that the Lord Ordinary has come to a right conclusion, and I agree in the grounds of his opinion and of the opinion of Lord Salvesen.

Held that jurisdiction in an action concluding for delivery of goods in terms of a contract between the parties, and failing delivery for damages was competently founded by arrestments ad fundandam jurisdictionem.

ON 9th January 1913 the Union Electric Company, Limited, Glasgow, June 5, 1913.
brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against Holman & Company, suppliers of dynamos, arc-lights, carbons, &c., who carried on business at Southwark, London, E.C. The action was founded upon an alleged breach by the defenders of a contract in terms of which they were bound to supply to the pursuers 30,000 pairs of carbons.

Union Electric
Co., Limited,
v. Holman &
Co.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

In the initial writ the pursuers craved the Court "to ordain the defenders to deliver to the pursuers 30,000 pairs Excello yellow flame carbons 600 m/m by 10 m/m and 9 m/m in terms of the said contract between the parties, and that within such short space of time as the Court may appoint; and failing the defenders so delivering the same to grant a decree against them for payment to the pursuers of £1000 sterling, with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per centum per annum from the date of citation to follow hereon till payment; or alternatively, to decern against the defenders for payment to the pursuers of the sum of £1000 sterling, with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent per annum from the date of citation till payment."*

The pursuers averred in their condescendence that they had constituted jurisdiction against the defenders by arrestments ad fundandam jurisdictionem in the hands of a firm of engineers in Glasgow.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) No jurisdiction; and separatim, the action is incompetent in respect that a decree ad factum præstandum cannot be granted by the Sheriff of Lanarkshire against an English company.

On 24th February 1913 the Sheriff-substitute (Lyell), after hearing parties on the question of jurisdiction, closed the record and appointed the case to be put to the Procedure-roll†

† "NOTE.—This is an action for implement of a contract, or failing implement for damages, in which jurisdiction has been founded by arrestment. The defenders object that in respect the leading conclusion is for delivery in implement of the contract—which is just a conclusion for decree ad factum præstandum—no effective jurisdiction has been founded against them by arrestment. The question is not free from difficulty, and one can certainly see that such a decree would be difficult to enforce against an English defender. It could not be enforced by registration under the Judgments Extension Act of 1882, which applies only to judgments for debt, damages, or costs. It has been held that arrestment does not confer jurisdiction to try questions of status, and it appears unsettled whether jurisdiction has been thereby conferred to try declarators and reductions—Lindsay v. London and North-Western Railway Company, 18 D. 62, 3 Macq. 99; Longworth v. Hope, 3 Macph. 1049; Shaw v. Dow and Dobbie, 7 Macph. 449. But after full consideration of the cases Lord Kincairney sustained his jurisdiction, when so created, in an action ad factum præstandum in Powell v. MacKenzie & Company, (1900) 8 S. L. T. 182. It appears to me, however, seeing that the conclusion for damages for breach of contract is obviously competent, that the pursuers might well confine themselves to that conclusion, more especially as, on their own showing, the contract cannot now be implemented in terms as the time of the delivery stipulated is long past. I shall therefore put the case out for further procedure, and allow the pursuers, if so advised, to strike out their conclusion for delivery, and confine their crave to one for damages in respect that the defenders have failed timeously to deliver the articles contracted for."

allowed the pursuers to amend their record, inter alia, by adding to the crave of the initial writ the words printed above in italics, and by interlocutor, dated 2nd April 1913, he allowed a proof before answer and also allowed the defenders to add to their pleadings the following pleas in law:—(1A) The amendments made by pursuers being incompetent and insufficient to alter or vary the ad factum præstandum conclusions still sought primo, the action should now be dismissed. (1B) In any event, in the action as amended by pursuers in terms of interlocutor dated 17th March 1913, the defenders plead "no jurisdiction" in so far as the ad factum præstandum conclusions are concerned; and separatim, the action is incompetent as regards the ad factum præstandum conclusions, in respect that a decree ad factum præstandum cannot be granted by the Sheriff of Lanarkshire against an English company; the action should therefore be dismissed, with expenses.

Argued for the appellants;—The jurisdiction which was founded by arrestment was a purely artificial jurisdiction and its scope should not be extended beyond the limits which were clearly recognised by authority.¹ Jurisdiction could not properly be so founded in actions other than those which were purely petitory; this was the ratio of the decisions excluding jurisdiction founded by arrestment in actions of declarator and in actions concerning status,² and an action ad factum præstandum was in the same position.³ The present action was not a purely petitory action; its main conclusion was a separate and substantive conclusion for decree of specific performance per se and was not merely explanatory of the petitory conclusion. In these circumstances the action must be looked upon as one ad factum præstandum, and there was no precedent for the foundation of jurisdiction by arrestment in such an action, even when it contained ancillary conclusions for payment. The pursuers were given the opportunity of amending their record to the effect of making the petitory conclusion the main conclusion of the action, as was done in Lindsay v. London and North-Western Railway Company,⁴ but they had not availed themselves thereof. In any case, if jurisdiction could not competently be founded by arrestment on the conclusions of the initial writ as they originally stood, this defect could not be cured by subsequent amendment.⁵

arrestments jurisdictionis fundandæ causa. The Sheriff said he thought the point was one of some nicety, but that he would continue the cause in order that the pursuers might abandon their claim for delivery and merely ask for damages for breach of contract. The pursuers, whether entirely understanding what the Sheriff had said or not I do not know, did amend their summons, but they did so by putting in a simple alternative conclusion for the sum of £1000 sterling. That amendment was allowed, and upon that the Sheriff sustained the jurisdiction and granted leave to appeal upon that question.

In my opinion no amendment of the writ was at all necessary, and if I thought that the jurisdiction depended upon the amendment I should have considerable doubt, because I humbly agree with what was said by Lord Adam in the case of Morley v. Jackson,¹ that if there is no jurisdiction when the parties join issue, it is difficult to see how you can then introduce jurisdiction by an amendment of the summons. But I do not think it at all necessary to consider that matter, because it seems to me that there was perfectly good jurisdiction irrespective of the amendment, and I cannot say that the learned counsel's address has given me any reason for forming another opinion. He quoted a great many cases with which we are quite familiar, illustrating the rule that you cannot have jurisdiction for actions such as actions of status and of pure declarator based upon an arrestment ad fundandam. I am tempted to say "Of course not."

I am not going to repeat what I said upon the origin of jurisdiction upon arrestment ad fundandam in the two cases of *Leggat Brothers*² and *Hope*³; historically the origin was that by the arrestment ad fundandam the pursuer got hold of something that would satisfy the judgment. In modern times that is not literally true, but the idea that something was got hold of which would satisfy the judgment was the foundation of the practice, and still remains the test of the competency. It follows, I think, that, if what you are asking from the Court is some class of decree which never can be worked out in money, then you cannot suppose that there will be a jurisdiction of the Court founded upon an arrestment of money the original use of which was merely to satisfy the judgment. But I think it is really a mistake to call the decree that is asked for in this action, an ordinary action founded upon breach of contract, a decree ad factum præstandum at all. There is no difficulty at all in working out this judgment in money. The point between the parties, upon the merits, is whether there is a contract or whether there is not, and this question must always, in such a case, be put for the decision of the Court. In one sense there is always a declarator subauditus in every decree that you ask. Take, for in-

It would be a perfectly good answer to say that the bill was forged or that the bill was obtained by false pretences, and yet the action could be nothing but a petitory action. Accordingly, it seems to me that a demand for a declarator is a first stage of every action, whether declarator is expressly concluded for or not.

It is argued that this is an action ad factum præstandum, and that the subjects arrested cannot satisfy the judgment in such an action. Now, it seems to me that when a person asks for delivery of a specific article of which there is a pretium affectionis, the decree that he wants is the true decree for specific performance; but when he says to the other person, "We have a contract: under that contract you are bound to deliver; you have not delivered; deliver or else pay damages," he is not asking for a decree ad factum præstandum in the proper sense at all. I think the absurdity of the situation can be illustrated by supposing that this had been an ordinary action in the Court of Session with a conclusion in the same form as the prayer of this initial writ, and that no question of jurisdiction had been raised, but decree in absence pronounced. The decree in absence would be a decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons, and the extract would echo the conclusions of the summons. Does anyone suppose that, if a person holding that decree had gone to a messenger and told him to charge upon the first portion of the summons, namely, that which asked for delivery, and had then come back to the Court, after delivery had not been implemented, that he would then have got from the Court a warrant for imprisonment? Such a thing would be absolutely inconceivable. And so the argument for the appellants really comes to this: it is incompetent because, being an Englishman, a Scotch Court could never do against him what it never would do against a Scotsman. The truth is that a person who comes and asks for a decree of this sort is not asking for a decree for specific performance at all. He is saying, "There is a contract between us, you have broken it; I am content with your giving me either what I am entitled to under the contract or, if not, paying damages."

It was said that there was no authority upon this matter. I should not expect to find authority upon it, because, as a matter of fact, it is not to be supposed that a case would be reported upon this point alone; such a case would only be found in the books if it raised some other point to be reported. But I have not a doubt that, with a little perseverance, one could find many cases in the books in which jurisdiction had been founded by arrestments on a summons in terms similar to those of this initial writ. There is not the shadow of a dictum to the contrary. One finds that Lord Ivory, in his well-known notes to Mr Erskine,¹ speaking of the class of actions which can and cannot be raised upon arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa, says that there is a distinction to be observed between such questions as originate in a mere ordinary patrimonial claim for the payment of debt or the performance of a mercantile contract or the like on one side, and questions of personal status, on the other. In other words, he absolutely assimilates an ordinary claim for payment and a claim for the performance of a mercantile contract. June 5, 1913.

Pearson v.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), Second Schedule, sec. 9—Memorandum of agreement—Recording of memorandum—Terms of memorandum differing from terms of agreement—Agreement to pay compensation in terms of the Act.

An injured workman and his employers verbally agreed that compensation should be paid to the former at the rate of 15s. 1d. per week. The workman thereafter signed a number of receipts, each of which bore to be for "weekly compensation to date under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, under which I claim for personal injury by accident sustained by me." Thereafter the employers objected to the recording of a memorandum which bore that the agreement was to pay compensation at the foresaid rate "until the same is ended, diminished, redeemed, or suspended in terms of" the Act, on the ground that the memorandum was not genuine, because it differed in terms from the agreement which contained no obligation as to future payments.

Held that the arbitrator, who had granted warrant to record the memorandum, was right in so doing, in respect that the agreement was an agreement to pay compensation in terms of the Act, and that the memorandum merely set forth those terms.

In an arbitration in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Glasgow under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, between James Pearson, an engine-driver, and his employers, Babcock & Wilcox, Limited, engineers, the Sheriff-substitute (Glegg), on the request of Pearson, authorised the recording of a memorandum purporting to set forth an agreement between the parties, and, at the request of the employers, stated a case for appeal.

1st DIVISION.

Lanarkshire.

It was stated in the case that the memorandum which it was sought to record was in the following terms:—"The claimant claimed compensation from the respondents in respect of personal injuries to his right hand and wrist, caused by accident in the employment of the respondents at their works at Renfrew, on the 28th day of February 1912. The question in dispute, which was the amount of compensation, was determined by agreement. The agreement was made on the 17th day of June 1912, and was as follows:—‘The respondents agreed to pay to the claimant compensation under the Workmen’s Compensation Act, 1906, at the rate of 15s. 1d. sterling per week, being 50 per cent of his average weekly earnings, beginning the first payment as at the 6th day of March 1912, and continuing the payment thereof until the same is ended, diminished, redeemed, or suspended in terms of the above-mentioned Act.’”

The case further stated:—

“On said memorandum being intimated to the appellants they lodged a minute of objections in the following terms:—‘The said Babcock & Wilcox, Limited, object to the recording of the said memorandum of alleged agreement on the ground that the memorandum is not genuine, the respondents not having made the agreement set forth in the memorandum. The claimant met with the accident as averred, and has been paid compensation since the date of the accident under the Workmen’s Compensation Act, 1906, at the rate of 15s. 1d. per week. No agreement, however, was made for payment of compensation, except an agreement to make the weekly payments which the claimant actually received, and in particular no agreement was made to continue payments of compensation until the same should be ended, diminished, redeemed, or suspended in terms of the Workmen’s Compensation Act, 1906.’”

“Proof was led before me on this date, 7th March 1913, the only evidence in the case being that of the respondent himself, and the receipts hereafter referred to which were recovered under diligence, when the following facts were established:—(1) The respondent, aged 43, sustained severe injury to his right hand and wrist on 28th February 1912. (2) On 17th June 1912 the respondent called for compensation, which was agreed upon at the rate of 15s. 1d. per week, and on 18th June 1912 he signed a receipt for payments down to that date in the following terms, viz.:—Received this 18th day of June 1912, from Babcock & Wilcox, Limited, the sum of £11, 13s. 10d., being weekly compensation to date under the Workmen’s Compensation Act, 1906, under which Act I elect to claim for personal injury by accident sustained by me on or about the 28th day of February 1912. . . . And on the following subsequent dates, viz., 29th July, 19th August, 2nd, 9th, 16th, and 23rd September, 8th, 14th, 21st, and 28th October, 4th, 11th, 18th, and 25th November, and 2nd, 10th, 16th, and 23rd December, all 1912, and 6th, 13th, and 20th January 1913, he signed receipts which are produced in process, the terms of said receipts being similar to those in the receipt granted on 18th June 1912. (3) On the occasion of the signing of the first receipt, he was told to return the following Monday for the next payment of compensation, and on each subsequent occasion down to 20th January aforesaid he was invited impliedly, if not explicitly, to return the following Monday. Nothing more was said. (4) On 20th January 1913 it was intimated to him that compensation was to be stopped, but no reason was assigned.

“I found it proved that on 17th June 1912 it was agreed between respondent and appellants that respondent should be paid 15s. 1d. per week in terms of the Workmen’s Compensation Act, 1906, the 15s. 1d. being 50 per cent of respondent’s average weekly earnings, and the payments to begin on 6th March 1912.

“I found in law that the terms of said agreement entitle respondent to record a memorandum in the terms craved.

"I therefore granted warrant to record accordingly, and found June 6, 1913. respondent entitled to expenses."

The questions of law were:—(1) Whether there was evidence upon which the arbitrator was entitled to find it proved that on 17th June 1912 it was agreed between the parties that the respondent should be paid 15s. 1d. per week in terms of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906? (2) If the foregoing question is answered in the affirmative, whether the terms of such agreement entitle the respondent to obtain warrant to record a memorandum in the terms craved?"

Pearson v.
Babcock &
Wilcox,
Limited.

The appeal was heard before the First Division on 6th June 1913.

Argued for the appellants:—The arbitrator was not entitled to order the recording of a memorandum of agreement containing a condition which had not formed part of the original agreement between the parties. This was what he had in effect done by allowing the words "continuing the payment thereof until the same is ended," &c., to appear in the memorandum.¹ It was no part of his duty to construe the agreement and to determine whether the memorandum gave effect to the agreement as so construed.² This had already been decided with regard to a written agreement, and there was no reason why an agreement partly written and partly verbal, as was that in question here, should not be subject to the same rule. The arbitrator had imported his own construction into the memorandum in the present case. It was not necessary for the appellants to show that the agreement would not bear the interpretation put upon it; it was enough for them to show that the memorandum as recorded contained more than the original agreement. Granted that the effect of the agreement was to bind the appellants to pay compensation at the stipulated rate during incapacity, that was something other than an agreement to continue such payments until ended, diminished, &c., in terms of the Act. An agreement to pay compensation during incapacity was spent by the recovery of the workman without the necessity for any further process.³ The Act contemplated agreement upon three possible points, viz.:—(1) the liability of the employer, (2) the amount, and (3) the duration of compensation.⁴ There was no reason, however, why a memorandum should not be recorded of an agreement which embraced the first and second points only, and was silent upon the third, as was the case with the agreement here in question.

Counsel for the respondent were not called upon.

LORD PRESIDENT.—[After narrating the facts]—In the case which he has stated for appeal the learned Sheriff says:—"I found it proved that on 17th June 1912 it was agreed between respondent and appellants that respondent should be paid 15s. 1d., in terms of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, the 15s. 1d. being 50 per cent of the respondent's average weekly earnings, and the payments to begin on 6th March 1912."

Pearson v.
Babcock &
Wilcox,
Limited.

Ld. President.

The first question that arises upon this appeal is whether upon the evidence before him the arbitrator was entitled to come to that finding. I think he clearly was. I think that, quite apart from the evidence of the respondent, who no doubt swore to the fact of that being the agreement, the very terms of the receipt, which were of course chosen by the employer and not by the workman, show perfectly clearly that the agreement was to pay weekly compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act at a certain rate.

Having come to that finding, the next step the Sheriff took was that he allowed the memorandum as produced to be recorded. The employers say that that is wrong, because the memorandum as recorded is not an absolute echo of the agreement as found proved by the Sheriff, and they especially rely upon the case of M'Lean v. Allan Line Steamship Company, Limited,¹ which was decided in this Division. In that case we decided that where parties had come to an agreement in writing and then a memorandum of agreement was tendered, it was not part of the duty of the Sheriff at that stage to interpret the writing in any way, that his action then was a purely ministerial one, and that the only way in which he could discharge that ministerial duty was to put the writing upon the register as he found it, that is to say if neither party objected to the writing being put on. But in the judgment which I pronounced there I carefully saved the case where there was no written agreement between the parties, because I said this: "In other words, I think it comes to this, that where an agreement which has been come to between the parties is admittedly in writing, the Sheriff must record that agreement as it stands and nothing else. It is otherwise if the agreement has been come to verbally and is then disputed: the Sheriff has in that case to decide on a proof what the true verbal agreement was."

To prevent misunderstanding, let me say one word about my use of the word "must"—"the Sheriff must record that agreement as it stands and nothing else." There was no objection by either party in M'Lean's case¹ to the agreement being recorded in some shape or other, and the word "must," as used by me, must be understood secundum subjectam materiem. I did not decide in that case anything contrary to the decision of the House of Lords in the case of Summerlee Iron Company.² If I did, of course I should have been deciding wrongly. I quite understand *Summerlee Iron Company*² to have decided this—that if the memorandum which the employer proposes to have recorded does not deal with the whole of the three points with which the Act deals, namely, the fact of liability, the amount to be paid, and the duration of liability to be fixed as the Act chooses to fix it under the procedure therein provided, if the memorandum tendered by the employer falls short in dealing with all those three points the workman is entitled to say, "That memorandum is not good enough for me; I am entitled to go to arbitration."

But coming back now to the present case, it seems to me that the only question is whether the memorandum, as the Sheriff has ordered it to be recorded, is in any sense different from the agreement as he finds it proved.

Now I think it is in substance absolutely the same. It is not absolutely the same textually, because there are one or two words which are different. But I think myself that the words "continuing the payment thereof until the same is ended, diminished, redeemed, or suspended in terms of the above-mentioned Act" are merely an expansion of the words "in terms of the Workmen's Compensation Act."

Pearson v.
Babcock &
Wilcox,
Limited.

Ld. President.

The learned counsel for the appellants here, who I must say argued his case remarkably well, argued that inasmuch as there was the possibility of coming to an agreement upon less than the whole three points under the Act, therefore an agreement in terms of the Act might be an agreement which did not deal with the whole terms of the Act. I do not think it is necessary to decide the question whether an agreement which deals with less than the three terms of the Act forms a proper subject for a memorandum which may be recorded. I do not think that the question is one of practical importance. I have already said that the House of Lords has determined that, if one of the parties objects to such a truncated memorandum, he is entitled to do so. But of course that is not the same proposition as to say that if both parties are agreed to put upon the record what I am calling a truncated memorandum they may not do so. I do not think it is necessary to decide that. Let us suppose that they may; you have still got to find out what is the agreement between the parties. It seems to me that, when the employers say, "We agree to pay so much a week in terms of the Workmen's Compensation Act," they necessarily say, "We agree to pay in terms of the whole provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act."

I ventured to put an illustration in the course of the argument which I think was quite sound. Suppose a landlord and tenant enter into a lease. They may say, "This lease is subject to the estate conditions which are authenticated in a certain way." If they say that, it will certainly import the whole estate conditions. There would be nothing wrong in their saying, if they chose, "This lease is subject to estate conditions 1, 5, and 12," and, in that case, 1, 5, and 12 would be binding and the others would not. So, for the moment, I will assume that there could be a perfectly good memorandum of agreement which imported an agreement upon less than the whole three points in the Act. But if nothing is said which cuts out certain portions, I think it is very clear indeed that "an agreement in terms of the Act" means an agreement in all the terms of the Act. And accordingly, when the Sheriff allowed the memorandum to be recorded with the words I have read in it, though the words were in one sense mere surplussage and did not add anything, to my mind the memorandum as recorded truly expressed the precise agreement which the Sheriff had already found proved.

Upon the whole matter, therefore, I am of opinion that the questions ought to be answered in the affirmative.

LORD KINNEAR.—I entirely agree with your Lordship. I think that an affirmative answer to the first question put by the learned Sheriff for the opinion of the Court concludes the whole matter. The Sheriff had to consider whether an agreement had been made in terms of the Act which could be put upon the register at all, and therefore he had to find upon evidence what the agreement really was which had been made between the workman and his employers, if any such agreement there were.

Now he found that it was proved that the workman and the employers had agreed that the workman should be paid 15s. 1d. a week in terms of the Workmen's Compensation Act, and he asks—and this is the only question on the agreement that is before the Court—whether there was evidence upon which he was entitled to find that proved. I think there was quite clear evidence before him which justified that finding. He had, according to his statement of fact, the evidence of the workman, who was the only witness tendered to him in the case, and he had the evidence of the receipt which was tendered by the employers to the workman in return for a weekly payment. Well, the receipt says that the workman has received a certain sum, being weekly compensation to date under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906. Now I apprehend that can have no meaning but one. It means that the money is tendered to him, and that he agrees to accept it as compensation fixed in terms of the Act. What the Act finds him entitled to is a weekly payment during the incapacity in a case where the incapacity has resulted from the injury.

It is said that that involves the consideration of three different points: In the first place, whether there is any liability at all in respect of the injury of which the workman complains; secondly, the amount of compensation, if there was such liability; and, thirdly, the duration of the compensation payable. I do not myself think that that third element enters into the question of agreement at all. The Act fixes that the compensation is to endure during the incapacity; and therefore the term of the duration of the compensation is fixed once for all by the statute itself. And the only question that can arise under the statute as to duration is whether, in point of fact, the incapacity is still enduring or not.

Now I agree that that is a question which, when it does arise, may be fixed by agreement or by arbitration, because, if the parties agree about it, there is no dispute; if there is any dispute, then the statute says any dispute in the course of the proceedings shall go to arbitration. There is an additional contingency which does not involve any alteration of the amount of the compensation but which affects the amount payable, because there is also a provision that the compensation may be redeemed by a single payment in certain circumstances; and therefore the Act says the compensation is to continue during incapacity and until it is ended, diminished, redeemed, or suspended. All these things appear to me to be clearly implied in an agreement that the compensation is to be a weekly compensation, payable under the Act and in terms of the Act.

That an agreement to that effect does not fix duration is perfectly clear; but no agreement fixing a definite duration would be in terms of the Act at all. The employer is not bound to undertake to pay for a fixed time, nor is the workman bound to accept a payment for a fixed time; but the amount of the compensation being fixed, the Act determines that it shall last until some change in the man's condition makes it right and proper that it should be altered. An agreement to that effect therefore appears to me to be clearly other than that implied in the terms of the receipt tendered by the employer; and if the receipt meant anything other than an agreement in the June 6, 1913. terms which have been registered in the memorandum, I think the case of *Pearson v. Freeland v. Summerlee Iron Company*¹ is an authoritative decision that the workman would not have been bound to accept it. He is not bound to accept a tender which gives him a sum of money for a limited time only. If the employer does not give him voluntarily the full benefit of the Act in accordance with its conditions, he is entitled to an arbitration.

Lord Kinnear.

It appears to me therefore that the Sheriff's first question must be answered in the affirmative, because there was evidence before him on which he could come to that conclusion; and if that be so, the second question appears to me to be of no importance whatever. If the memorandum of agreement which the Sheriff was asked to record had omitted the words between "beginning the first payment" and the words "the above-mentioned Act," I think it would have had exactly the same effect as it has in the terms which are actually expressed. I see no difference between saying that the respondents have agreed to pay a certain weekly compensation, beginning the first payment on the 6th March, "in terms of the above-mentioned Act," and saying that they have agreed to pay that amount, beginning at that date, and continuing the payment thereof until the same is ended, diminished, redeemed, or suspended, because the additional words simply express what is clearly implied in the words which are admittedly proper, namely "in terms of the Act." I therefore agree with your Lordship.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I cannot decide this question without paying some regard to the real question behind the technical question. There is no doubt that employers have felt it a very great hardship that they should under certain circumstances have to go on paying at the full rate after the workman has either entirely or partially recovered, and therefore after he should be getting only a modified amount of compensation. I sympathise entirely with that feeling, and I cannot help thinking that there is a certain defect in the Act as regards this point. But we have got to administer the Act as it stands.

Now what these employers want to ascertain is whether they can, out of their agreement made with their workman, deduce the conclusion that at their own will they may say, "This agreement is now at an end in respect that there has been recovery." Because if one looks at their minute of objections it becomes apparent that their contention is that no agreement was made for payment of compensation except an agreement to make the weekly payments which the claimant actually received, and in particular no agreement to continue payment of compensation until the same should be ended or diminished under the Act.

Now if one looks at the form of receipt granted by the workman it is hardly possible to square that statement with its terms. Because it would lead to this, that there was no agreement whatever to pay compensation, but merely the act of payment, which only involves an agreement ad hoc, or to make that particular payment. Thus on 29th July 1912 they would maintain:—"There is no obligation on us to pay anything, though we did pay

June 6, 1913. on 18th June. Each payment constitutes a new agreement." It is in accordance with this contention that with their last payment on 20th January they intimate that compensation is to be stopped, that is to say, that there is no agreement for the future.

Pearson v.
Babcock &
Wilcox,
Limited.

Ld. Johnston.

Now I do not think it is possible to maintain that such an agreement would be an agreement for compensation under the statute. The whole error on the part of the appellants appears to me to be in attempting to maintain that ab initio there can and must be, if the agreement is to be an agreement under the statute, a determination of all the three points of liability, of amount, and of duration. There must be an agreement or a determination ab initio of liability, but it is always of liability under this Act. In the same way there must and can be ab initio a determination of amount under this Act. These things are matters which must be fixed ab initio. But you cannot fix the duration of the compensation ab initio. That must always be determined according to the event. The question of duration can only be determined when there is a call for review, as is provided for in the 16th section of the Act.

Now if that be the case, in order to make any particular agreement an agreement under the statute it is only necessary that it should contain the terms which the Sheriff has used. For it is perfectly immaterial whether the memorandum of agreement says that the appellants "agreed to pay compensation under the Act at the rate of," &c., or adds, "during total disablement," or adds, "continuing the payment thereof until the same is ended," &c. These three forms are precisely the same in result, and no agreement is an agreement under the statute which does not, in one form or another, provide for liability and amount and leave duration to be determined at the proper time and from time to time. I therefore think that though the Sheriff has sanctioned the recording of an agreement which includes the latter expression, the words are innocuous because if they were not there they would be implied. Accordingly I agree with your Lordships in the way in which you propose to answer the questions.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the conclusive answer to the first question that is put is to be found in the terms of the receipt which is quoted in the case, because that bears that the workman received from the employers a sum of money, "being weekly compensation to date, under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, under which Act I elect to claim for personal injury by accident." He made the claim under the Act. The payment was made to him in satisfaction of that claim, and the employer was content to accept a receipt which expressly bore that it was received "under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906."

Now under those circumstances the Sheriff had ample justification for finding in fact that the agreement was made in terms of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906. I am unable to see, as regards the second question which is put, how, when that conclusion is reached, it is possible to say that the true construction of the agreement is not simply that it is in terms of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, which is scheduled as part of the agreement. If that conclusion is reached, then all that the Sheriff has done in granting warrant to record the memorandum in the terms June 6, 1913. which are complained of here is merely to write at greater length that which is contained in the finding of fact that he sets forth in the latter part of the case.

Diligence—Arrestment—Ship—Maritime lien—Process—Form of process for making effective maritime lien.

Clan Line
Steamers,
Limited, v.
Earl of Douglas
Steamship
Co., Limited.

Where one vessel owing to her faulty navigation has damaged another vessel, the maritime lien over the former available to the owner of the latter cannot be made effective by arrestment of the vessel on the dependence of an action against her owner concluding for a sum of damages and separatim for declarator of lien and for warrant to sell. So held in an action for the recall of an arrestment so used.

Opinion (per the Lord President) that the maritime lien could be made effective by arrestment of the vessel upon special application, e.g., in the Bill Chamber, after citation of all parties interested.

ON 24th April 1913 the Earl of Douglas Steamship Company, Limited, brought an action in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Glasgow against the Clan Line Steamers, Limited, the initial writ in which was in these terms:—"The claim or demand of the pursuers is for payment of £1400, being loss and damage sustained by the pursuers through their s.s. 'Earl of Douglas,' while lying at anchor in the harbour of Newcastle, N.S.W., on 4th October 1912, being run into by the defenders' s.s. 'Clan Ogilvy,' while under way, by reason of the negligent navigation of the said s.s. 'Clan Ogilvy,' and separatim for declarator that the pursuers have a lien over the said s.s. 'Clan Ogilvy' for the damage so sustained, and for warrant to sell the said s.s. 'Clan Ogilvy' on said lien being declared, and to apply the proceeds in satisfaction of said lien towards the payment of said sum of £1400, being the loss and damage sustained by the pursuers. Therefore the pursuers crave the Court to decern against the defenders for payment to the pursuers of the sum of £1400, with interest thereon at 5 per cent per annum from the date of citation till payment, and meantime to grant warrant to arrest on the dependence, and separatim to find and declare that the pursuers have a lien over the said s.s. 'Clan Ogilvy' for said damage; [to grant decree for expenses]; to find the defenders liable in the expenses of this process, and on said lien being declared, to grant warrant for the sale of said ship at the sight of such person as the Court may appoint, and to appoint the free proceeds of sale after deducting the expenses of the said ship from the date of her arrestment, the harbour dues and other necessary charges, the expenses of sale, and the expenses of this process, to be paid to the pursuers to be applied towards payment of said sum of £1400, any balance thereafter remaining to be paid to the defenders, or dealt with in such other way as the Court may find just; and, meantime, to grant warrant to arrest on the dependence."

Douglas
Steamship

The words above enclosed in brackets were allowed to be deleted, and those printed in italics were allowed to be added by way of amendment by interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute (Thomson) dated 2nd May 1913.

On 29th April, prior to the date of the latter interlocutor, the "Clan Ogilvy" was arrested by the pursuers on a warrant granted by the Sheriff-substitute.

On 30th April 1913 the Clan Line Steamers, Limited, brought the present petition in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Glasgow against the Earl of Douglas Steamship Company, Limited, for recall of the arrestment.

On 5th May the Sheriff-substitute pronounced the following interlocutor in the petition:—"On the petitioners finding caution . . . to the extent of £1500 sterling, for the payment of such sums, principal, interest, and expenses, as may be decerned for in the action, on the dependence of which the arrestment in question has been laid, recalls the said arrestment." *

* "NOTE.—The principal petition, as it originally stood, and as it was served on the defenders, contained two prayers, the first for payment of £1400, and the second for declarator that pursuers were entitled to a maritime lien over defenders' ship.

"Warrant to arrest on the dependence was granted. It was plainly competent to grant it in respect of the first conclusion. It would not, I think, have been competent to grant it had there only been the second conclusion as it stood before amendment.

"An arrestment was used, and the present pursuers now petition to have it recalled, so that the ship may proceed upon her voyage. I have found that the arrestment may be recalled, provided security be found for £1500 to meet a possible decree for £1400 and expenses, being the sums specifically concluded for.

"This is satisfactory to the pursuers but not to the defenders, who, with the view of strengthening their case, proposed at the bar to amend the principal petition, which amendment I allowed in terms of their minute then and there produced.

"Four contentions, I understand, were proposed for the defenders. (1) That the second conclusion as it originally stood was of itself sufficient to justify the arrestment. This contention I have no difficulty in repelling. (2) That, seeing the first conclusion justified the warrant for, and the use of, the arrestment, the arrestment became available for the purposes of the second conclusion. They contended that the vessel having been arrested it was thereby rendered subject to the orders of the Court, so that the Court might not only provide for the specific pecuniary claim which was the subject of the first conclusion, but pronounce any further order or condition to safeguard the rights of the defenders in the event of the Court granting declarator of a maritime lien in terms of the second conclusion. This contention, I think, is unsound. As yet, no maritime lien has been established, and none attaches, although when established it may be retroactive. An ordinary lien depends upon possession of the subject, but in a case like the present the vessel is in the possession of its owners. It is by the arrestment certainly detained or arrested, but only in respect of a specific money claim, and when, in the opinion of the Court, adequate security or provision for that claim is made, it seems right that the vessel should be released. I fail to see any authority for the principle that an arrestment upon the dependence for one claim serves as an arrestment for all other claims which the defenders may have against the pursuers. (3) It is contended further, that, apart from the arrestment altogether, the Court may detain the ship, the defenders stating that in England application may be

The respondents (the Earl of Douglas Steamship Company, Limited) appealed to the Court of Session against this interlocutor, and the appeal was heard before the First Division on 22nd May 1913.

Argued for the appellants;—The arrestments had been wrongly recalled. The appellants had a good maritime lien over the “Clan Ogilvy,” assuming that she was to blame for the damage which had been done to the “Earl of Douglas”; she became burdened with the weight of this wrong, and the injured party could make good his remedy against the ship in whose hands soever she might be, the law of maritime lien being as much part of the law of Scotland as of England.¹ If this proposition were sound then there must be some made to the Courts for the attachment of a vessel in respect of an alleged claim for a maritime lien consequent upon a collision. This may or may not be the law of England, but I am not aware of any authority at all justifying such a course in Scotland, and I am not prepared to sustain this contention. (4) The fourth contention arises out of the amendment of the petition in the original action. This amendment was, as I have already stated, proposed at the bar, and I allowed it to be made. It seemed competent to allow it under rule 79 of the Sheriff Courts Act, 1907. What its effect may be as regards the pursuers has now to be considered. What its effect may be as regards third parties is a matter to be decided when it is raised by some third party.

“It seems to me that the amendment leaves the matter as it stood before the amendment was made. The amendment consists in a craving for the various successive steps of procedure which will be required in order to give pecuniary effect to the maritime lien if declared. The final step of such procedure is payment of the free proceeds of the sale of the vessel to the defenders in satisfaction of their said claim for damages and expenses. I am disposed to think that this conclusion may, on the authorities, be held to justify a warrant for and the use of an arrestment upon the dependence, but it would only be for and in respect of the specific pecuniary claim, and this claim is just the claim made in the first conclusion, and the matter stands, therefore, where it did. While I reach this result, which is favourable to the pursuers, I am against them on one of the arguments which I understood them to make, founded on the effect of the amendment, in view of rule 80 of the Sheriff Courts Act, 1907, viz., that there is no question here of ‘validating’ diligence used prior thereto on the dependence of the action.’ The arrestment, they contend, was valid from the first, so far as it went, and does not require to be validated at all. If anything, it requires to be enlarged; and they say that without a new arrestment the amendment can have no effect even in a question with the defenders. I doubt the soundness of this contention. The execution of arrestment bears that ‘all is to remain in the said harbour of Glasgow under sure fence and arrestment, aye and until sufficient caution and security be found . . . that the same shall be made forthcoming to the pursuers as accords of law.’ This, I rather think, means until security be found that the vessel be made forthcoming to the pursuers as accords of law, or that the specific pecuniary claims made in the action, whether originally or by amendment, and in respect of which arrestment on the dependence might be and was competently used, be adequately provided for in lieu of the production of the vessel itself; and, accordingly, I am against the pursuers as regards this argument.

“But, upon the whole case, I am in their favour as regards the recall of the arrestment, and I allow it to be recalled on the terms stated in the interlocutor.”

legal process by which the injured party could establish his lien and make good his remedy against the ship. The only procedure known to the law of Scotland by which this right could be made good and followed to its logical conclusion was that of arrestment. In the present case arrestments had been used on the dependence of an action which combined a prayer for declarator of lien with one for payment of a sum of damages. It was admitted that the arrestments on the dependence could only be made good by a furthcoming in so far as the petitory conclusion of the action was concerned; as regarded the conclusion for declarator of lien there could be a special petition for sale, which would be the process equivalent to a furthcoming upon an arrestment on the dependence of an ordinary petitory action, and this procedure would be open to the appellants even if they were successful in the action only upon the prayer for declarator of the lien.¹

Argued for the respondents (the Clan Line Steamers, Limited);— Assuming that the appellants had a good maritime lien over the "Clan Ogilvy" in respect of the damage done, the arrestments which had been used in the present case were not an appropriate or competent form of diligence by which that lien could be made good. The arrestments had been used on the dependence of the action as originally raised, and their scope must be found in the initial writ in the form in which it stood at the date the arrestments were used, and before the amendments had been added. An arrestment on the dependence could not be changed into a real diligence by subsequently amending the initial writ.² The writ concluded for a sum of £1400 in name of damages, and, separatim, for declarator of lien. Now the arrestments used could only be made effective by furthcoming, and that furthcoming was only available to work out a personal decree in an action in rem, that is to say, in the present case, the claim of damages. The appellants asked for an arrestment to found a furthcoming in what was not an action in rem, but a bare declarator; for this there was no precedent. What the appellants in effect sought to do was to convert this action into the English Admiralty action in rem. That was clearly incompetent, if for no other reason than that the only parties here called were the owners of the "Clan Ogilvy." An action such as it was sought to pursue must be served upon, or notice thereof must be given to, all the parties interested in the vessel and her cargo, i.e., the charterers, owners of cargo, &c. It was not for the respondents to suggest the form of process which the appellants should have adopted in order to make good this lien, it was enough for them to show that the form which had been adopted was an inappropriate one. There was no recognised procedure in Scotland in the matter, but the appellants might have applied to the Court for a special warrant to arrest the vessel similar to that issued in the English Admiralty action in rem.³

LORD PRESIDENT.—The owners of a steamer called the "Earl of Douglas"

Clan Line
Steamers,
Limited, v.
Earl of Douglas
Steamship
Co., Limited.
Ld. President.

The initial writ, as served, made a claim against the defenders (the petitioners in the petition which is before us) and craved the Court to decern against the defenders for payment of the sum of £1400, and the initial writ went on with a crave "separatim, for declarator that the pursuers have a lien over the said s.s. 'Clan Ogilvy' for the damage so sustained," and the crave concluded with a prayer asking the Court to grant warrant to arrest on the dependence. In that state of the process, an arrestment on the dependence of the action was executed, in ordinary form, of the "Clan Ogilvy" as she lay in the graving dock of the harbour of Glasgow.

The owners of the "Clan Ogilvy" then raised the process which is now before us, against the owners of the "Earl of Douglas," in which they prayed for a recall of the arrestments. Concurrently with that, the pursuers in the original action moved for leave to amend, which leave to amend was granted; and the amendment which they made was that they added after the portion of the crave "for declarator that the pursuers have a lien over the said s.s. 'Clan Ogilvy' for the damage so sustained" the words "and for warrant to sell the said s.s. 'Clan Ogilvy' on said lien being declared, and to apply the proceeds in satisfaction of said lien towards the payment of said sum of £1400, being the loss and damage sustained by the pursuers."

The learned Sheriff-substitute, having considered the application for recall of the arrestment and the answers put in in the original action, pronounced this interlocutor in the process for recall: "On the petitioners finding caution . . . to the extent of £1500 sterling for the payment of such sums, principal, interest, and expenses, as may be decerned for in the action on the dependence of which the arrestment in question has been laid, recalls the said arrestment."

Now the owners of the "Earl of Douglas" have appealed that interlocutor to your Lordships, and they object to the form in which the Sheriff-substitute has recalled the arrestments, because they say—and they say truly—that what the Sheriff-substitute has done does not make the arrestments available for that part of the process which seeks to declare and make good a real lien against the ship. The respondents did not argue—and I think, in view of the authorities, it would have been useless to argue—that the arrestment upon the dependence was not quite a good arrestment in so far as it could be made available for the purposes of the pecuniary conclusion against the defenders for the £1400; but they said, and they said with success, to the learned Sheriff-substitute that that was all that the arrestment on dependence could be made good for. The appellants, on the other hand, argued before your Lordships that the arrestment was good to cover, so to speak, both branches of the prayer.

I am of opinion that the Sheriff-substitute has come to a right conclusion, and I think, upon grounds which are generally right, although there is one part of the note which he attaches to his judgment with which I cannot

June 12, 1913. agree for reasons which will become clear when I have finished my observations.

Clan Line
Steamers,
Limited, v.
Earl of Douglas
Steamship
Co., Limited.
Ld. President.

The arrestment on dependence, which is a matter of right in our law to anyone who raises an action, is a very familiar and well-known form of diligence, and its object is to arrest, that is to say to keep fixed, some asset of the debtor, the defender in the action, in order that that asset may be made good to satisfy the decree which the pursuer assumes he is going to get. Ordinarily speaking, arrestment could never be in the hands of the debtor himself but must be in the hands of someone else. But none the less, it is a process for keeping something which may be made a fund of payment for what the debtor will be found to owe when a decree has been obtained against him under a petitory conclusion; and I may add that it is trite law that the next proceeding, in order to make that sum available, is a furthcoming. Arrestment of a ship is rather different. Arrestment of a ship is a diligence which is not used in the hands of somebody else but which is used as a real diligence against the ship itself, and it is eventually made good, not by an action of furthcoming, but by a process of sale.

None the less, I think it is absolutely settled in our law that it is quite good to have an arrestment on dependence directed against a ship, and I would remind your Lordships of the case, which I do not think was quoted to us in the argument, of Carlberg v. Borjesson,¹ where all through the learned Judges' opinions no doubt is expressed that an arrestment of a ship on the dependence is a perfectly good form of diligence. Of course the point in *Carlberg v. Borjesson*¹ was quite different. In *Carlberg v. Borjesson*¹ the vessel had taken no notice of the arrestment which had been put upon it ad fundandam jurisdictionem, and had sailed down the Clyde; and the way of executing the arrestment upon the dependence had been to man a steamer, go after her, and bring her back. It was held that all that was quite illegal. But, none the less, their Lordships recognise that arrestment of a ship upon the dependence was perfectly good, and that it would have been perfectly good in this case if the ship had stayed in Glasgow and been found at anchor in the harbour. What I have just said is pointed out by Lord Shand in a passage in his opinion, at p. 195: "The arrestment of a vessel differs from an ordinary arrestment in being a real diligence directed against the vessel itself, and unlike a personal diligence of arrestment directed against a custodier or debtor in a sum of money. Its effect, as the term 'arrest' itself implies, is to fix the vessel in the place in which she is found, and if there is any danger of her being removed from that place, the power to dismantle may be exercised." But although arrestment as applied to a ship is, so to speak, peculiar, none the less the underlying idea of it is precisely the same as ordinary arrestment, namely, to fix in the territory something which shall be a fund of payment for the decree which is got under the petitory conclusion. And accordingly I think the parties were quite right in not objecting to the interlocutor in so far as it ordained caution.

But when we come to the second matter, that seems to me to be quite different. I think probably, as a mere technical point, that this case could have been disposed of upon the ground that diligence must always be viewed strictly, and that therefore the effect of the diligence must be viewed as the crave originally stood, without the amendment. But I do not care to base my judgment upon that point. For my present purpose I will assume that the original crave of the initial writ in the original action had been in the form in which it eventually stood after the amendment.

Olan Line
Steamers,
Limited, v.
Earl of Douglas

Ld. President.

Now what is the second branch of the crave? It is to have a maritime lien declared. There is no question, after the House of Lords case of Currie v. M'Knight,¹ that this maritime lien exists for such claims in the law of Scotland. But the working out of the maritime lien must be by effectuating a sale of the ship as a real diligence against all and sundry and not merely against the person who is called in the petitory part of this action and asked to submit to a decree. If it is a good lien, the ship can be sold, and it does not matter to whom the ship belongs. Now if that is so, that seems to me to make an arrestment on the dependence an inappropriate form of diligence, because you are not there working out your payment out of the property of the debtor; you are not dealing with a debtor; you are dealing with the ship itself, which is supposed, so to speak, to be the living agent of the wrong that has been done to you. And therefore I do not think arrestment upon the dependence is an appropriate form of diligence.

I now come to the only part of the learned Sheriff-substitute's note with which I do not agree, namely, that in which it is said: "It is contended further that, apart from the arrestment altogether, the Court may detain the ship, the defenders stating that in England application may be made to the Courts for the attachment of a vessel in respect of an alleged claim for a maritime lien consequent upon a collision. This may or may not be the law of England, but I am not aware of any authority at all justifying such a course in Scotland, and I am not prepared to sustain this contention." I think that, if we could not keep the ship in order to make good the maritime lien, it would be very little use having a maritime lien in our law at all. And therefore I have not a doubt that there may be a good arrestment put upon the ship in order to prevent the ship going away and, so to speak, withdrawing herself from the process of sale which is directed against her in respect of the maritime lien, and therefore I do not agree with the learned Sheriff-substitute. But then I think that would have to be done by special application for arrestment, and there is ample authority for special application. In particular it is to be found in the case of Lucovich.² This special application could be made in the Bill Chamber. That has not been done here; this is a mere arrestment on the dependence.

Accordingly, for these reasons I am of opinion that the result to which the learned Sheriff-substitute has come is quite right.

LORD KINNAR.—I agree entirely with what your Lordship has said.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I am of the same opinion. Where there has been a collision between two vessels, there is a claim by the owners of the injured

Ld. Johnston.

Since 1897, however, when the case of the "Dunlossit"¹ was decided in the House of Lords, it has been established that there may also be in Scotland as well as in England a remedy to the injured party through what is known as a maritime lien, but that does not involve an action in personam, but a process against the ship itself.

It is quite true that, as far as we know, since 1896 no case has occurred in which the doctrine there laid down as the law of Scotland has been applied. And everybody sympathises with the eminent firm who have initiated these proceedings in the difficulty they experienced in adopting an apposite form of procedure. But I think their mistake arose—and I am referring to the original petition, not as amended—in attempting to combine in the same procedure the action in personam and the effectuating of the remedy in rem. And for this reason—where you are proceeding with an action in personam and arrest on the dependence of that action, you are arresting only the interest of the owners whom you are pursuing. There may be other rights in the ship preferable to the owners', but those are not touched by your arrestment, and the protection of them is not necessary in the action. It is provided for in the forthcoming where opportunity is afforded to all interested, as for instance to mortgagees, to bring forward their preferable rights.

But where you are proceeding to enforce the right in rem, the position is not the same, and you cannot, as it seems to me, declare your maritime lien and proceed to sell, unless you have all parties together in the field. And it is there that, it seems to me, the attempt to combine these two proceedings has been a mistake, because the pursuers here seek separatim for a declarator which could not be properly granted in the presence merely of the owners, who are the sole defenders in the action, but could only be granted where all others interested have been called into Court, or, at any rate, have been given an opportunity of appearing. It seems to me, therefore, that the second part of this proceeding is inept, because it is impossible to proceed in rem except after calling a different set of defenders. And I think further that, even if all interested were convened, the combination of the two processes would be very inconvenient.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I must not be taken as agreeing with a portion of what Lord Johnston has said. I only say this because the question will arise what is the proper procedure to be adopted in making good a maritime lien. Although I quite agree that the conclusion to make good the lien is quite different from the petitory conclusion against the one person who is called, and although certainly in any process which has for its object the making good of the real lien there would have to be at least edictal citation of everybody concerned, I do not see any absolute incompetency in combining these two conclusions in the same process if you like. I think it right to say that in this case.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), sec. 1 (1)—“Accident”—Deafness following upon chill—Chill due to voluntarily waiting in water accumulated in mine through breakdown of a pump.

M'Luckie v.
John Watson,
Limited.

A miner, about to ascend to the surface at the end of his shift, in order to be among the first to obtain a place in the cage, stood for upwards of thirty minutes in a pool of water which had accumulated in the pit bottom owing to a defect in the pump. Had he waited his turn upon dry ground, as he might have done, he could have reached the cage comparatively dry. Owing to the wetting he contracted a chill which produced deafness, causing incapacity.

Held that the incapacity was not due to injury by accident in the sense of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906.

Drylie v. Alloa Coal Co., Limited, supra, p. 549, distinguished.

In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, in which Alexander M'Luckie, miner, claimed compensation from John Watson, Limited, the Sheriff-substitute at Hamilton (Shennan) refused compensation and, at the request of the workman, stated a case for appeal.

1st DIVISION.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

The case set forth:—“(1) The appellant was a miner in the employment of the respondents in their Gilbertfield Colliery from 8th April 1912. . . . (2) The pump of the pit was frequently out of order, so that the pit bottom was often flooded, and the men were often drenched by water coming down the shaft while they were being raised to the surface. The miners repeatedly complained of this to the checkweighman. (3) On each of the 9th and 10th September 1912 the pumping gear went wrong, and in consequence thereof water accumulated in the pit bottom to a depth of about 18 inches at the cage, gradually shallowing back from the cage for about 30 feet to where the ground was dry. (4) On each of these days only one cage carrying eight men was available for raising the men to the surface at the close of the shift, and there were about two hundred men to be raised. As each was eager to get the first chance of ascending all of them waded into the water at the pit bottom and stood in it, some from thirty to forty-five minutes. There was no necessity for this. The traffic near the pit bottom had ceased at the time, and the men could with safety have waited on the dry ground till their turn came to ascend. They could then have crawled over hutches which were shoved towards the cage, and could thus have reached the cage comparatively dry. (5) On both the 9th and the 10th September the appellant was among those who were thus standing in the water at the pit bottom, and he stood thus waiting between thirty and forty-five minutes. He was sweating profusely when he came from his work to the pit bottom on 9th September. (6) On 9th and 10th September 1912 the appellant was also drenched by water in the shaft when he was ascending. (7) On 11th September 1912 the appellant was out at his work, but was suffering from chill. On the following day he was worse, but went out to work. On 13th September 1912 he was totally deaf, and was, and still is, unfit to work as a miner. (8) Before September 1912 the appellant suffered from chronic middle-ear disease, but this did not cause serious deafness, and did not interfere with his capacity for work. The total deafness from which he has suffered since 13th September 1912 is due to an affection of both the internal ears. This total deafness is not connected with the previous middle-ear disease, but has almost certainly been caused by chill arising from exposure. (9) The evidence did not establish definitely any time, place, and circumstance under which appellant contracted the chill. He may even have contracted it before 9th September, but in all probability its inciting cause was some or all of the wet conditions which prevailed in the pit on 9th and 10th September. The proof does not disclose a definite event as the cause of the chill.

"In those circumstances I held that the appellant had failed to prove that his incapacity was due to accident. I held, further, that if it could be held that standing voluntarily for thirty minutes in the pit bottom was an accident, it was one which did not arise out of the appellant's employment. Accordingly, I refused the appellant's claim for compensation."

The questions of law were :—“(1) Was the arbitrator wrong in holding that the appellant had failed to prove that his incapacity was due to accident arising out of and in the course of his employment with respondents? (2) On the facts found proved, was the arbitrator wrong in refusing compensation to appellant?”

The case was heard before the First Division on 12th June 1913.

Argued for the appellant ;—The present case was indistinguishable from the case of Drylie v. Alloa Coal Company, Limited,¹ because, as in that case, so in the present, the breaking down of the pump was an accident in the sense of the Act. The Sheriff-substitute's findings disclosed a complete chain of causation between that accident and the chill from which the appellant suffered; thus the case was distinguishable from that of Brown v. John Watson, Limited,² in which the case of *Drylie*¹ had been distinguished. The appellant could not have left the pit without getting drenched even if he had waited his turn upon dry ground, and accordingly it could not be said that his chill was due to his having exposed himself to a risk which was not one of the risks of his employment. Esto that he had been careless and had adopted a wrong method of leaving the pit which had increased the ordinary risk of contracting chill, his carelessness did not take him out of his employment.³

Counsel for the respondents was not called upon.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I do not think there is the slightest doubt that the learned Sheriff-substitute has come to quite the right conclusion. I think it is very probable that, if he had had an opportunity of reading the case of *Drylie v. Alloa Coal Company*¹—which he had not, because his judgment was given before that case was decided—he might very likely have expressed himself differently, because I think the way he has expressed himself is really an echo of what was said in the case of Eke v. Hart-Dyke.² But none the less I think that the result he has come to is obviously right, and I think we should be really casting the law completely adrift from the ratio of the Alloa Coal Company case¹ if we came to any other conclusion.

In the Alloa Coal Company case¹ the pit was flooded through an accident, and was flooded to such an extent that the men thought they were in danger of their lives, and rushed to the pit bottom in order to get up to the surface—not at the ordinary time and in the ordinary course of their business, but, as they thought, in order to escape from drowning. While there, they were subjected to a severe wetting, and the learned Sheriff-substitute, who acted as arbitrator in the case, came to the conclusion that the disease of which the man died was contracted through the exposure to which he was then subjected. In that case it was held that there had been an accident, and that it occurred out of and in the course of the employment.

But what do we have here? We have, I agree, an accident in this way, that the pump broke down and there was water at the pit bottom; but there is no suggestion that there was the slightest danger to anybody owing to the amount of water at the bottom of the pit. The men were going up to the surface when their work was done, in the ordinary way, and if each man had waited his turn he would only have got his feet wet in getting to the cage—or, as the learned Sheriff-substitute says, if they had been anxious not to get their feet wet, they could have avoided even that to a large extent by crawling over some hutches which were pushed towards the cage. Instead of waiting their turn the workmen were all anxious to get to the cage at once, and this man walked into the water and stood there for at least thirty minutes, and in consequence of that the Sheriff-substitute thinks it is probable that he got the chill which caused the infirmity from which he suffered.

It seems to me impossible to say that that was an accident which arose out of and in the course of the employment, and it is futile to say—as was pleaded by counsel—that the workman might have been just as ill if he had had an ordinary wetting of his feet instead of voluntarily staying in the water for thirty minutes. I think that the case is an exceedingly clear one, and that the questions should be answered in the negative.

LORD KINNEAR.—I entirely concur. I only add, because I was not a party to the judgment in the case of Drylie v. The Alloa Coal Company,¹ that I assent to all that was said by your Lordship and by Lord Mackenzie in that case. But I think the present case is to be distinguished for the reasons given by your Lordship.

LORD JOHNSTON and LORD MACKENZIE concurred.

THE COURT answered the questions in the negative, and dismissed the appeal.

In an appeal by stated case to the Sheriff in an arbitration under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1908, the Sheriff, in his interlocutor answering the questions of law, found the appellant (the tenant) liable in expenses, and allowed fees to counsel.

In an appeal to the Court of Session the Court recalled the Sheriff's interlocutor, but found the respondent (the landlord) entitled to the expenses of the stated case.

Held that the Auditor, in taxing the account of these expenses, had warrant for the allowance of counsel's fees in the Sheriff Court although the Sheriff's interlocutor, in which fees were allowed, had been recalled.

In March 1912 Catherine Eleanor Florence, Knowley, Warthill, Aberdeenshire, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Dundee against George Smith, Dundee, concluding for declarator that the defender was the father of an illegitimate child of which the pursuer was delivered on 5th November 1911, and for payment of inlying expenses and of aliment for the child.

The defender denied that he was the father of the child.

Proof was allowed and led. The import of the evidence is fully given in the note of the Sheriff-substitute (Neish).

On 26th July 1912 the Sheriff-substitute assolizied the defender.*

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session, and the case was heard before the Second Division (without Lord Guthrie) on 17th and 18th June 1913.

Florence v.
Smith.

Argued for appellant;—The Sheriff had found, and it was clearly proved, that an act of connection had taken place on 18th March. This fact coupled with the proof that the parties were on intimate terms, and that they had opportunities of meeting about the date of conception, corroborated the pursuer's testimony and raised a presumption of paternity against the defender.¹ The pursuer was in a much stronger position than if the defender had admitted the connection on 18th March. By his denial of such a material fact the credibility of his whole evidence was destroyed, and the pursuer was left uncontradicted.²

Argued for the respondent;—The verdict of the Judge who had seen the witnesses should not be disturbed. The pursuer's case rested with her father at Knowley, except for a period from January 1909 to May 1909, when she was in Aberdeen attending cooking classes.

"The defender, on leaving school in January 1906, went to a bank in Inverurie. In May 1908 he was transferred to Durno. He remained there till January 1910, and during this period resided at home. From Durno he was transferred to Huntly, and remained there till September 1911, when he was transferred to Loches. While at Huntly he came home at times for the week-end.

"The pursuer says she was sweethearting with the defender, and this is the view taken of their relations by her father, her sister, her brother, Adam Addison, and John Addison. On the other hand, the defender's mother will not admit that her son was more friendly with the pursuer than with any other girl, although she admits that she knew that 'Eleanor was fond of George.' The defender's brother Robert did not look upon them as sweethearts. The defender admits that he was 'on pretty friendly terms' with the pursuer, and walked her home pretty often from church and choir practice. He has taken her arm and put his arm round her waist, but he has not kissed her, except when they were children. He was not courting the pursuer. 'I liked her, that was all. I had nothing against her.'

"There are two incidents to which I must refer in connection with the degree of intimacy between the parties.

"The first took place about the end of 1909 after choir practice. The defender drove his sister home to Tocher, then got on his bicycle and met the pursuer and her sister at the end of Tocher Road. He saw the girls home to Knowley, and at the gate he left his bicycle with the pursuer's sister Alice, and went with the pursuer to the back of the house. The pursuer then says the defender tried to have connection with her, but that she resisted him. The defender denies that he attempted connection, and says his going away with the pursuer was by way of a joke to tease the younger sister. He says he expected Alice to lay down the bicycle and come and look for the truants. That part of the joke certainly did not come off. The idea of a joke never occurred to Alice, who says she was asked to hold the bicycle and light the lamp. Nor did it occur to the pursuer's father that it was a joke against Alice. He, finding Alice with the bicycle, took it inside the house, locked the door, and did not give the bicycle back to

There was no proof of a meeting between the parties at the critical date, and therefore no proof of "opportunity," such as there was in the cases of *Ross v. Fraser*¹ and McDonald v. Glass.² Proof of connection subsequent to conception was much less cogent than proof of prior connection, and per se was insufficient corroboration.³ The authorities cited on the question of the defender's false denial had no application. In those cases there was direct proof of the fact which was denied. In this case what was denied, namely, that connection took place on 18th March, was only an inference from proved facts, and these facts, in all material details, were admitted.

Florence v.
Smith.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case I have come to the conclusion that, while the Sheriff-substitute's summary of the facts is well stated and con-the defender till he had chaffed him, he does not say on what subject, but certainly not I fancy on playing hide-and-seek with Alice. The impression left on my mind is that the idea of a joke upon Alice is an afterthought, and that the defender desired to be alone with the pursuer. Again I doubt the defender when he says that he merely went out to take a run on his bicycle. I believe he came just to meet the girls on their way back from choir practice. I also doubt his tale about the soft tyre; at any rate this incident is not put to the girls. In my opinion, whether or not the defender attempted connection on this occasion, he left Alice and went round to the back of the house for the purpose of being alone with the pursuer, and not as he says to play a game of hide-and-seek with Alice.

"The next incident took place in the loft or barn at Knowley, about six weeks before the Premnay expedition, which took place in September 1910.

"The description of this building is very confused in the evidence, but it seems to have had a door and a trap-door down to the cart shed. It is admitted that the parties were in the loft together. The pursuer says the defender locked the door, and again attempted connection, but without success. The defender denies both these statements. The pursuer's brother Douglas came to look for them, the defender jumped through the trap-door, and the pursuer came out at the door. Again the defender says he jumped through the trap-door for a joke.

"I do not say that the evidence with regard to these incidents necessarily leads to the conclusion that the defender did attempt connection on these occasions. After all, the parties had known each other since childhood, they were near neighbours, their families were on terms of intimacy, and their fathers were related. I should have thought these incidents trivial, had it not been for the impression left on my mind that the defender is unduly anxious to avoid any imputation of intimacy with the pursuer. Whether or not they were sweethearts, I think it is not easy to read the evidence in the case without coming to the conclusion that they mutually evinced a decided preference for each other's company and, when the occasion served, preferred that they should not be troubled with the presence of a third party.

"I ought to say a word about the postcards which the pursuer has produced. Again, looking to the childhood friendship of the parties, I do not know that they are unduly affectionate in their terms. The pursuer says she destroyed letters which she had at the defender's request. The defender denies that he made any such request. If she did so, it is a little difficult the time when her child must have been conceived. If she could produce no further evidence in corroboration of her story her case would certainly fail, but the case does not stand there. There is a further allegation that the parties had connection at a date some six weeks subsequent to the date of conception. Now as regards that incident, I think it throws a strong light on the case. The pursuer said that she and the defender, having parted from their two companions on a Saturday evening, lay down on a bank by the side of the road, and there had connection. The defender denies that, but he does not deny that he was there, and he admits certain to understand why she did not burn the postcards also. She says herself that she did not burn the postcards because she had the postcards at Know-ley and the letters in Aberdeen, but if, as the pursuer says, the bonfire took place in Aberdeen she has preserved three of the postcards which she received in Aberdeen, and presumably she had them there.

"Premnay, September 1910.—This is the first occasion upon which the pursuer speaks to connection. The defender and his brother were bicycling to Premnay. They were overtaken by the pursuer and her brother. The four visited a mutual friend in Premnay. On the way back the party divided at Old Rayne. The pursuer and defender took the long road, the other pair took the short road, and the four met again at Rayne School.
 The pursuer says connection took place on this occasion. Defender denies it. There is controversy as to how long James Smith and Douglas Florence had to wait at the school. Douglas says twenty minutes or half-an-hour. James says five minutes. The defender says he suggested a race ; his brother corroborates him. I see no reason to doubt that a race was suggested, but I also suspect that the defender wanted to get away with the pursuer alone. Whether or not connection took place on this occasion is a very difficult question. I do not think it can be said that this public road during the daytime was a suspicious or secret place, and no one saw any familiarity between the parties on this ride, and although I do think the parties may be fairly described as sweethearts by this time, I do not think I am prepared to say the connection on this occasion is proved.

"September 1910-January 1911.—The pursuer says she had connection with the defender several times between these dates. She gives neither day nor place, and there is no evidence as to the parties even having been seen together during this period.

"The end of January or beginning of February 1911.—The pursuer speaks to connection at this time. This is the crucial date for the pursuer, because it corresponds with the ordinary date of conception. The child was born on 5th November 1911. The pursuer fixes the date because it was about the time the choir practices were resumed. According to Isobel Smith the first choir practice for the session was on 14th February. The defender according to his own account was at home on Sundays 15th and 22nd January and 5th and 12th February. The pursuer says,—'He had connection with me on a Saturday or Sunday. I saw him at church on the Sunday, and he walked home with me. He said he would be passing in the evening, and to look out for him between seven and eight. I did so, and he came. I went out with him and we went down the road between Tocher Farm and our own farm. He had connection with me on the roadside. I was with him about a quarter of an hour. My father sus-

June 18, 1913. facts which tend very much against his defence. The pursuer is corroborated in her account of this incident by a witness, Adam Addison, whose evidence the Sheriff-substitute found no reason to doubt, and who speaks to having seen, on that occasion, what was certainly an act of gross familiarity between the parties. The defender had a pony with him, and the evidence of this witness is that the pony was left on the road, that the pursuer and the defender were lying at the roadside, that he had both his arms round her, and that she was heard laughing. If there is no reason for doubting this evidence it is of the greatest possible importance comparing it with the evidence of the defender. He knew that this evidence had been led, and he probably knew that an absolute denial would be fatal to his case, if the pursuer and Addison were believed. What he did was to deny that intercourse had taken place and to try ingeniously to fritter away what was observed by Addison. He denies that he had both arms round pected we were out.' Now, the father is not asked about this incident; no one saw the parties together at this time, no one saw them walk home from the church. The meeting rests upon the pursuer's evidence alone. The defender says he was never at Knowley during this time between 1st January and 18th March, and he denies connection.

"11th or 12th March.—This is the next occasion to which the pursuer speaks. She is somewhat confused as to whether it was a Saturday or a Sunday (11th or 12th March). The defender says he was not at home that week-end, and he is corroborated by his mother, his sister, and his brother. His sister remembers that Sunday, because one of the candidates for the post of organist did not come forward and she had to play. Mr Ross for the pursuer objected to evidence being led as to the defender not having been home for this week-end, on the ground that it was an attempt to prove an alibi, of which no notice had been given on record. I did not think the evidence did amount to an attempt to prove an alibi in the strict sense of the word. Such an attempt would have been made had the defender adduced evidence to prove that he was in Huntly, but he led no such evidence. All he tries to prove is that he was not at home. Possibly he should have said so on record, but I don't think the question of whether or not the evidence should have been allowed is of much importance. I certainly did not think it right to compel the defender to amend with the penalty of paying expenses, but I expressly reserved the pursuer's right to lead her conjunct probation, and she did not avail herself of this reservation; I suppose because she could not produce any witness who did see the defender at home this week-end. If the evidence is bad, then again the alleged meeting rests solely on the pursuer's evidence. If the evidence is good, as in my opinion it is, I think it is quite clearly proved that the pursuer is mistaken as to this date.

"18th March.—It is admitted that on this date the parties walked home from choir practice, the defender leading his pony, and that they sat down on the brae. Adam Addison says he saw the couple lying at the roadside, and that the defender had both his arms round the pursuer. The defender admits 'his arm was through hers.' 'Both my arms were not round her.' The pursuer says connection took place on this occasion, the defender denies connection.

"2nd April.—On this occasion, the pursuer, defender, Mary Durno, and Watt walked home together from church in the evening. Pursuer and defender started in front, but afterwards allowed Mary Durno and Watt to pass them. Mary Durno says they had to wait for the other couple a quarter of an hour, and that defender had his arm round pursuer's waist. Watt thinks they waited ten minutes. This is the last occasion on which pursuer says connection took place. The defender again denies connection.

her, and says that one arm was through hers; he denies that the pony was June 18, 1913. left loose on the road, and maintains that the rein was never out of his hand. If his story is untrue, and the Sheriff-substitute holds so, that is a strong element in considering whether the pursuer has sufficient corroboration of her statement that connection took place a few weeks earlier. The case of *Macpherson v. Largue*¹ and several other cases bear out that such facts may be taken into account in considering whether the pursuer has proved her case. I think that, taking the facts to which I have adverted into consideration, there is in the evidence before us sufficient corroboration of the pursuer's otherwise unsupported statement that the defender had connection with her about the time of conception of the child. I am therefore for recalling the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute and finding for the pursuer.

The pursuer has consistently maintained from the first that the defender is the father of her child, and the defender has, as consistently, denied the imputation.

"I think the most serious part of the evidence for the defender as regards connection, is the meeting on 18th March. If Adam Addison is to be believed, the defender's position was very compromising. The hour was late, about ten o'clock. Choir practice began that night at 7.30, and usually lasted an hour, so that the parties had taken some little time on their way home. Addison watched them for ten minutes, but it is fair to presume that he saw no further impropriety than both the defender's arms round the pursuer. I frankly confess, however, that in my opinion, looking to the intimacy between the parties as evidenced by other incidents in the case, there is enough evidence to corroborate the pursuer's story of connection on this occasion. But then I do not think connection, even if proved on this occasion, is sufficient to father the child upon the defender.

"The pursuer is quite indefinite in her condescendence as to the particular act of connection to which she attributes the conception of her child. She is equally indefinite in her evidence, indeed she is not examined on this point. Now, the child was born on 5th November, and if conceived on 18th March, the period of gestation would be 232 days in place of the usual 274 to 280. I do not, of course, suggest that 232 days is an impossible period of gestation, but it is an unusual period. There is no hint or suggestion, on the whole case or in the pursuer's evidence, that her baby was not a full time child, and I think that, if the pursuer intended to rely upon this date as the occasion when her child was conceived, some such evidence as I have indicated should have been forthcoming. In fact, of course, she maintains connection at the end of January or beginning of February, a date which would coincide with the ordinary period of gestation.

"It is right that I should say that I am not prepared to hold that the pursuer has proved connection either on the road from Premnay or on 2nd April. Granted that on these occasions the defender showed a greater desire to be alone with the pursuer than he is ready to admit, I do not think the surrounding circumstances of these incidents necessarily or actually lead to the conclusion that connection took place on these occasions, but again neither occasion coincides with the usual period of gestation.

"The question remains whether, granted that connection is proved on 18th March, that, taken along with the other incidents in the case, such as the parties' partiality for each other's company and such familiarities as are spoken to, is sufficient to corroborate the pursuer and to prove that a meeting and connection took place at the end of January or beginning of February. I do not know what might have been the result if there had been

June 18, 1913. LORD DUNDAS.—I think this case, like many of its kind, is rather a narrow one. I need not say I should be slow to differ from the careful judgment of an experienced Sheriff-substitute in a case like this upon any mere question of fact; and, so far as his digest of the facts is concerned, I am prepared to agree with the Sheriff-substitute entirely. But I differ from his conclusion, because I think he has failed to deduce the right legal inferences from the facts, and especially from one salient incident to which I shall presently refer. That being so, I need not deal with the facts in any detail, except with regard to that one incident. The general setting of the picture, so to speak, discloses that these two young people—the pursuer, at the date of the proof, was only twenty, and the defender twenty-two—were born and brought up in close intimacy with one another. Their fathers are relatives, and of similar stations in life—small farmers, living on farms close to each other; the children grew up together, and as they reached years of maturity were on terms of great intimacy, with an element of what may fairly be described as “sweethearting.” All that, of course, is quite consistent with innocent intimacy and innocent affection. But a child was born to the pursuer on the 5th November 1911, and no other man than the defender can, upon the evidence, be pointed to as, in the least degree, a probable father of the child. Still it is for the pursuer to prove her case; and but for the one incident, which I now come to consider, I should have held, with the Sheriff-substitute, that she had failed to prove it. As to that incident, the pursuer depones that late on the evening of the 18th of March 1911 she and the defender were alone together on the roadside, between the smithy and the smith's house, and that connection took place on that occasion. In this she is materially corroborated by Adam Addison, an independent witness, against whose credibility nothing has been suggested. He some independent proof of the parties having met at this time, although I do not know that connection in January or February is to be presumed because it took place in March, but there is absolutely no direct evidence of their meeting except the pursuer's own statement. Opportunity for meeting there was in the sense that the defender was at his own home for the week-ends of 22nd January and 5th February, but there is no direct corroboration of the pursuer's statement that they did meet; of opportunity for connection in the proper sense there is no evidence beyond that of the pursuer. No one indeed speaks to having seen the parties together between the Premnay incident in 1910 and 18th March 1911. Suspicion there may be that the pursuer is fathering her child upon the proper person, but I do not think the issue in this case can be decided upon suspicion. In my opinion the pursuer cannot succeed unless her own evidence is supported by such corroboration as is reasonable to prove the issue of paternity which she maintains, and that issue is to my mind dependent upon her proving connection at the end of January or beginning of February. It is not to be left out of account that, in my opinion, the pursuer is mistaken as to the meeting on 11th or 12th March, and, giving all weight to her own evidence, she may be mistaken as to the crucial meeting.

“Cases of this kind are always difficult. I think there is perhaps more than the usual difficulty in this case, but I have found myself unable to hold that there is sufficient corroboration of the pursuer's evidence with regard to the alleged meeting at the end of January or beginning of February to enable me to give a verdict in her favour.

says he saw the two lying together on the roadside, and that both the June 18, 1913.
 defender's arms were round the pursuer, who was laughing. The defender ^{Florence v.} does not deny that he was with the pursuer at the time and place spoken ^{Smith.} to, but he says that they were not lying down but only sitting or leaning ^{Lord Dundas.} back on the bank; he denies that his arms were round her, though one of his arms was through her arm, and he denies that he had connection with her. Now, there is a series of recent decisions to the effect that where a defender falsely denies some fact bearing materially upon the crucial issue in dispute, that denial may turn the scale against him, in an otherwise doubtful case, by giving a complexion to the case different from that which the Court might, but for such denial, have put upon it. I do not know whether the Sheriff-substitute had his attention called to these cases. I am inclined to believe that they were not cited in the discussion before him, because otherwise, I think, he would probably have referred to them in the course of his carefully expressed opinion. If the cases were not cited, that would readily account for the Sheriff-substitute having fallen into error, as I think he has fallen, in regard to the legal aspect of the matter. However that may be, it is sufficient to remind your Lordships of the case of Macpher- son v. Largue,¹ since followed and approved at least twice by the First Division during the presidency of Lord Dunedin, in Dawson v. M'Kenzie,² and M'Whirter v. Lynch.³ In the last case the Lord President said: "I have nothing more to add to what I said in Dawson v. M'Kenzie as to the scope of this doctrine of corroboration by contradiction, but, as I do not wish to quote myself, I will quote a sentence of Lord M'Laren's opinion in that case: 'There must be corroboration of the pursuer's evidence; yet when the effect of the defender's false evidence, i.e., his denial of circumstances which are otherwise proved, is to show that there is something of which he is ashamed, or something the admission of which he conceived would throw suspicion on himself, this will put a different complexion on what the Court might otherwise be disposed to regard as innocent intimacy between the parties.'" I think that is very apposite to the present case.
 It is true that, assuming that connection took place on the 18th of March, that would probably not account for the conception of the child, because there is nothing in the evidence to show that the child was born before the expiry of the usual and normal period of gestation. But that does not affect the material bearing on the case of the evidence to which I have alluded.
 It seems to me that Addison's evidence, and the defender's denial of the material parts of it, go far to corroborate the general truth of the pursuer's story, though there is no specific proof of any connection at an earlier date corresponding to the period of conception. The parties were not far off from one another at and about that period. That being so, I think that there is sufficient ground for altering the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute.
 We have nothing to do with the question which would have arisen if the defender had frankly admitted connection on the 18th of March, while maintaining his defence in all other respects. But it seems to me there is the greatest possible difference between an admission by a defender of connection at a date subsequent to that of conception of the child, and a denial

June 18, 1913. by him of such connection, proved to be false. And as cases on that point have been referred to, I should like to add that, as at present advised, I respectfully differ from some of the views which have been expressed in previous cases. I think there is a great difference between an admission of intercourse prior, and an admission of intercourse subsequent, to the date when the child must have been conceived. I respectfully differ from the observations on this matter by Lord Young in M'Donald v. Glass,¹ and prefer such opinions as that of Lord Neaves in Ross v. Fraser,² and those of the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Trayner in Buchanan v. Finlayson.³ But in the circumstances of this case it is unnecessary, and would indeed be inappropriate, to consider what might have been the position if the defender had admitted intercourse with the pursuer on the 18th of March. I agree with your Lordship in thinking that we ought to sustain this appeal, recall the interlocutor appealed against, and find that the pursuer has proved her case against the defender.

LORD SALVESEN.—I entirely agree with the result at which your Lordships have arrived. For my part I do not think it is a difficult case and I should have had no hesitation in reaching an opposite conclusion from the Sheriff-substitute upon the facts as he has stated them. The parties were of the same social rank, had been intimate for years, and had corresponded on friendly and even affectionate terms. In the letters from the pursuer there are hints of clandestine meetings, and in the defender's postcards there are expressions only consistent with affectionate regard. They sought each other's company and took many occasions to be alone together. There are two incidents, prior to the crucial date of 18th March, namely, the bicycle incident and the incident in the loft, to which I think the Sheriff-substitute has not attached sufficient importance. On both these occasions the defender attempted to explain his behaviour as a "joke." I must say that I do not appreciate the joke in his locking himself into a hayloft with the girl whom he was courting, and then when disturbed leaving the premises by a trap-door while she went out by the door by which they had entered. It is very easy to explain the defender's conduct on the footing that he felt himself in a compromising position and took what he thought was a way of avoiding detection, and very difficult to explain it as a joke. As to the bicycle incident it was a very extraordinary joke that the little girl should be left to hold the bicycle while the pursuer and defender went behind the house in the dark for 10 or 15 minutes. It appears to me to be easily explained by the desire of the parties to be alone. The pursuer does not say that connection took place on these occasions, though she says it was attempted. But they are significant as leading up to subsequent events, and are made the more significant by the way in which the defender tries to explain them.

As to the actual date of conception there is no direct evidence of connection except that of the pursuer herself. But it is proved that about that time the defender was visiting his own home about 10 minutes distance from the pursuer's house, and that they were in the habit of frequently walking out together. The pursuer says there was connection at a date June 18, 1913 which corresponds with one or more of the visits made by the defender to ^{Florence v.} his parents. I think therefore that there was ample opportunity for meet- ^{Smith.} ing in the way the pursuer says that they did, and I do not understand ^{Lord Salvesen.} what the Sheriff means when he says there was no proof of "opportunity for connection in the proper sense."

At the same time, if the case had stopped here, I agree that the pursuer would not have proved her case, although there might have been little moral doubt that the defender was the father of the child. But the subsequent incident on 18th March leaves no doubt in my mind that the pursuer's story is sufficiently corroborated to warrant our proceeding upon it. In many cases mere proof of gross familiarity denied by the defender is sufficient to corroborate a pursuer who is otherwise a credible witness. And there can be no grosser act of familiarity than an act of connection. If, as the Sheriff holds, connection took place within six weeks of the date of conception, and there is nothing to suggest that it took place then for the first time, it would be extraordinary not to hold that sufficient corroboration. Of course cases can be figured in which it might not be sufficient, but, in the special circumstances of this case, I think that an admission of connection on 18th March would have been sufficient corroboration of the pursuer. But the case is made much stronger when we find that the defender denies the fact which the Sheriff finds proved. That gives a different complexion to the whole case, for it deprives the defender's evidence of credibility, and we are left in the position of having the pursuer's evidence amply corroborated, while no regard falls to be paid to the counter evidence of the defender.

I have therefore no doubt that the pursuer has proved her case, and, indeed, there are few occasions in which I have felt more confidence that the legal result at which we have arrived corresponds with the truth and justice of the case.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, and decerned against the defender in terms of the conclusions of the initial writ, with expenses.

GEORGE DUKE M'NICOLL AND OTHERS (Mrs Eliza Lennox Henderson's Trustees), Appellants.—Clyde, K.C.—Macquisten.

Sol.-Gen. Anderson—J. A. T. Robertson.

Revenue—Stamp-duty—"Deed"—Writ—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vict. cap. 39), First Schedule.

The First Schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891, includes, among stamp-duties payable on instruments, a duty of 10s. on "Deed of any kind whatsoever not described in this Schedule."

Held that a minute of acceptance of office by trustees, engrossed upon a trust-disposition and settlement and signed by the trustees before two subscribing witnesses, was not a "deed" within the meaning of the Schedule, and was not chargeable with a stamp-duty of 10s., or with any stamp-duty.

Henderson's
Trustees v.
Commissioners of Inland
Revenue.

June 19, 1913. Henderson's Trustees v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue. AT the end of a trust-disposition and settlement, executed by Mrs Eliza Lennox Henderson, there was engrossed a minute of acceptance of office by the trustees appointed thereunder in the following terms:—
 “We, George Duke M’Nicol, solicitor, Kirriemuir, James Russell, coal exporter, Glasgow, Hector Murray Macneal, shipowner, residing at thirty-nine Lilybank Gardens, Hillhead, Glasgow, and David Baird Smith, writer, Glasgow, do hereby accept the offices of trustee and executor conferred upon us by the foregoing trust-disposition and settlement.—In witness whereof, this minute written by William Nicol, clerk to Baird Smiths, Muirhead, & Guthrie Smith, writers in Glasgow, is subscribed by us all at Glasgow, on the fourth day of August Nineteen hundred and ten, before these witnesses, the said William Nicol and William John Wilson, commissionaire to the said Baird Smiths, Muirhead, & Guthrie Smith. (Signed) GEORGE D. M’NICOLL, JAMES RUSSELL, HECTOR M. MACNEAL, DAVID BAIRD SMITH. William Nicol, witness; W. J. Wilson, witness.”

1ST DIVISION.

The Commissioners of Inland Revenue were of opinion that this minute of acceptance was chargeable in terms of the First Schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891,* with a stamp-duty of 10s., and it was stamped accordingly.

Mrs Henderson's trustees required the Commissioners to state a case for the opinion of the Court of Session.

The question of law for the opinion of the Court was:—“Whether the said instrument is liable to be assessed and charged with the said duty of 10s.; or, if not liable to be assessed with that duty, with what other stamp-duty, if any, it is liable to be assessed and charged.”

The case was heard before the First Division (without Lord Johnston) on 17th June 1913.

Argued for the appellants;—The writing in question was not a “deed” within the meaning of the First Schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891. The word “deed” was used throughout that Act as a term of art and in the technical sense known to English law, and the present writing lacked the requirements necessarily incident to a deed in that technical sense.¹ It was in that sense that the words must be construed here, because in a taxing Act applicable to the United Kingdom one meaning only was to be attributed to a word unless the Act expressly provided for several meanings, each applicable to a different part of the United Kingdom. The writing, however, was not even a deed in the sense known to the law of Scotland, where the word bore a wider and less restricted meaning. In Scotland a “deed” might be described as an operative document which conferred or transferred a right, or, to use the words of Professor Bell,² “in the Stamp Acts the term ‘deed’ is applicable to any writing by which it is intended that, upon its execution, and at once, an obligation or right shall be constituted in favour of the grantee.” By an acceptance of office as a trustee no right was constituted or conferred or transferred in favour of anyone, and the wholly unnecessary formalities observed in signifying the acceptance could not make the document anything more than it in fact was, viz., a simple statement of the fact of acceptance.³ Stamp-duty could never be held to be imposed where no transfer or nexus was operated, unless the language which imposed it was clear and distinct in its terms.¹

Argued for the respondents;—Any writing which created a legal relationship was a "deed," and the acceptance in question created a new legal relationship, or at least completed one partly established by the trust-disposition and settlement. The respondents did not rely upon the particular form in which the acceptance was drawn. A holograph writing intimating acceptance of office would have been as much a deed as the writing in question.² It was in accordance with practice to require such acceptances to be stamped if they were brought to the notice of the Revenue officials.

Henderson's
Trustees v.
Commissioners of Inland
Revenue.

At advising on 19th June 1913,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an appeal as to an assessment of stamp-duty of 10s. which was made in respect that upon a trust-disposition and settlement there was engrossed an acceptance of trust by the trustees who had been named in the trust-disposition and settlement, which acceptance was signed and tested. The Inland Revenue attempt to justify the assessment by reference to the part of the First Schedule to the Stamp Act, which says:—"Deed of any kind whatsoever, not described in this schedule, 10s."

Now the Stamp Act does not define what a deed is, and I think it unnecessary to consider whether the word "deed" is there used as a term of art, because in any case it is only in England that it is so used. I am quite content to take "deed" as being used in the popular sense. The statute has not defined what a deed is, nor am I tempted to give a definition, but I am certainly clearly of opinion that, whatever is a deed, this acceptance of trust is not, and I do not suppose that anyone could be found in the legal profession who would ever dream of calling it any such thing.

An acceptance by trustees, in usual practice, is made by the first minute in the trust sederunt-book. Here it was thought that it would be a good thing to write the acceptance on the trust-settlement, and in order, I suppose, to save the trustees the trouble of writing it holograph, it was signed and tested. To engross it in the manner I have described upon the trust-disposition was quite unnecessary, but quite innocuous; and to suppose that that constituted the acceptance a deed is contrary to ordinary common sense and common parlance.

The learned counsel arguing for the assessment said that this was a deed because it was something which constituted a new legal relation. Well, it did constitute a legal relation. But that attempted definition will never do. According to that definition you could not endorse an ordinary bill of exchange without a 10s. stamp, because you undoubtedly constitute a new legal relation when you endorse a bill of exchange; and many other examples might be suggested.

June 19, 1913. I am of opinion that the assessment is wrong, and that the appeal should be allowed.

Henderson's
Trustees v.
Commissioners of Inland
Revenue.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am entirely of the same opinion, and I agree with your Lordship that for the purpose of this case the word "deed" is a word of ordinary language, because it is not in our system a term of art. I agree also that it is unnecessary to attempt any exact definition of what the word "deed" means; but I take the definition which was suggested in the ingenious argument for the Inland Revenue, in which it was said that a deed was any formal instrument which creates a legal relation. Now this writing is certainly formal; indeed it is unnecessarily formal and cumbrous for the purpose for which it is made; but it does not, by itself, create any legal relation whatever. Taken by itself it is nothing, and it has no effect or meaning. Its whole force depends upon its reference to the foregoing trust-disposition and settlement, which is undoubtedly a deed in the ordinary sense in which we use the word. It is an acceptance of the office conferred by the trust-disposition and settlement. It is a mere note of acceptance which might have been made in any form, or which might have been dispensed with altogether, if the persons named as trustees were willing to act, because their attendance at meetings and a note to the effect that they had been present was quite enough.

It is true, of course, that the trust-disposition does not, in itself, constitute the particular persons as trustees until they do accept; but so far as anything like a deed is concerned, it is that instrument and that instrument alone which creates the trust. The fact of acceptance may be proved by writing or by parole, and, if by writing, by any informal note under the hand of a trustee or by any note made by the agent of the trust at a meeting of the trustees.

I therefore agree with your Lordship that the assessment here was wrong, and that the appeal should be allowed.

LORD MACKENZIE concurred.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, found that the instrument in question was not chargeable with any stamp-duty, and ordered the Commissioners to repay to the appellants the sum of 10s.

M'Gowan v.
City of

Society.

Friendly Society—Jurisdiction—Exclusion of jurisdiction—Rule of friendly society for settlement by arbitration of disputes between society and members—Election of member to board of management contrary to rule—Declarator that election void—Competence of action—Whether rule permissive in form is in effect imperative—Friendly Societies Act, 1896 (59 and 60 Vict. cap. 25), secs. 9 (3), 68 (1), First Schedule (8).

In an action by a member of a friendly society against the society for declarator that the appointment of another member to the board of management was void in respect that under the rules of the society he was ineligible for election, it was in defence denied that he was ineligible, and it was also pleaded that the action was excluded by a rule of the society that "all disputes between the society and any member as such . . . may be determined by arbitration." The rule was passed under the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, which provides that every dispute between a member and the society shall be decided in manner directed by the rules of the society "without appeal, and shall not be removable into any Court of law. . . ."

Held that the action was competent in respect that the jurisdiction of the Court was not excluded in a case where the averment was that the society had acted in violation of its rules and constitution.

Opinion reserved, per Lord Salvesen, on the question whether the rule of the society as to the settlement of disputes was in effect imperative though in form merely permissive.

Process—Reduction—Necessity for reduction—Friendly Society—Election of member to board of management—Declarator that election void—Necessity for reduction of minutes of meeting at which election made.

The rules of a friendly society provided that members should be represented by delegates elected by themselves, and that minutes of the district meetings at which the election took place should be kept and transmitted to the secretary of the society. It was further provided that the delegates should elect from among themselves a board of management.

Held that an action for declarator that the election of a member to the board of management was void, in respect that he was ineligible to act as a delegate, could competently be brought without reduction of the minutes of the meeting at which he was appointed a delegate, or of those of the meeting at which he was elected to the board.

ON 4th March 1912 Arthur M'Gowan, Kilmarnock, brought an action in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Glasgow against (1) the City of Glasgow Friendly Society, registered under the Friendly Societies Acts, (2) Robert Pirie, M.D., and others, the trustees of the Society, and (3) Alexander Boag, Uddington. 2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

The claim of the pursuer was:—"(1) For declarator (a) that the pretended election of the defender Alexander Boag as a member of the board of management of the City of Glasgow Friendly Society at the annual general meeting of delegates of said Society, held on adjournment on 13th December 1911, was null and void, in respect

June 19, 1913. that under the rules of the Society he was ineligible as a delegate thereof, and therefore as a member of the said board of management, by reason of his being more than ten weeks in arrears with his subscriptions as a member of the said Society, both at the time of his pretended election as a delegate and also at the time of his pretended election as a member of the board of management of the said Society; and (b) that the pursuer was duly and legally elected a member of the said board of management at the said annual general meeting, in respect that he, as a candidate for election as a member of the said board of management, received the largest number of votes at said annual general meeting after the defender the said Alexander Boag, who was ineligible as a delegate and member of the said board of management as aforesaid; and (2) for interdict against the said The City of Glasgow Friendly Society and the said trustees thereof summoning the said Alexander Boag to meetings of the said board of management as a member thereof, and paying him any remuneration as a member thereof, and also against the said Alexander Boag acting as a member of said board of management."

The pursuer, after averring that he was a member of the Society, continued:—(Cond. 4) "At the meeting for the election of delegates,* held in the Motherwell district in March/April 1909, the

No person who is over fourteen weeks in arrears shall gain admission to the meeting. (2) The delegates shall elect from among themselves a board of management consisting of nine members. (6) [The secretary] shall call and attend all meetings of the Society, of the board of management, and of the committees, and engross minutes of the proceedings in the minute-books. Each minute shall be signed either by the chairman who presided at the meeting or by the chairman of the meeting at which it has been passed as correct." "VI. (6) All disputes between the Society and any member as such, or any person claiming through a member as such, which cannot be settled in the Small-Debt Court, may be determined by arbitration, and the following regulations shall apply to all arbitrations under the rules of the Society:—(1) The arbiter shall be appointed by the Sheriff or Sheriff-substitute where the applicant for arbitration resides, after he has consigned at the head office of the Society as security for the arbiter's fee the sum of £1, 1s., where the amount in dispute does not exceed £20, or £3, 3s. in all other cases." The rules also provided for the remuneration of the members of the board of management.

defender the said Alexander Boag was present and was a candidate for the office of delegate, and after a vote was declared elected a delegate." (Cond. 5) "At the date of said meeting and of his pretended election as a delegate the said Alexander Boag was over fourteen weeks in arrears with his subscriptions, and was therefore not entitled to be present at the meeting, and was not eligible to act as a delegate. This was apparent from the books of the Society, and was known, or should have been known, to the said Society. . . . The said Alexander Boag's pretended election as a delegate was therefore null and void. . . ." (Cond. 6) "At the annual general meeting of the Society which was called for June 1911, and held, after adjournment, on 13th December 1911, the defender the said Alexander Boag and the pursuer were candidates for election as members of the board of management, and the said Alexander Boag was declared elected. The pursuer was declared not elected. The said pretended election of the said Alexander Boag as a member of the said board of management was in breach of the rules, incompetent, and null and void in respect that he was not then eligible to act as a delegate, and was therefore not a competent candidate for election as a member of the said board of management by reason of his being more than ten weeks in arrears with his subscriptions as a member of the said Society at the date of his pretended election as a delegate. He was also more than ten weeks in arrears at the date of his pretended election as a member of the said board of management. . . ." (Cond. 7) "At the said adjourned annual meeting of the Society, held on 13th December 1911 . . . the pursuer received the largest number of votes as a candidate for election as a member of said board of management to fill said vacancy therein immediately after the defender the said Alexander Boag, and was eligible for election as a member thereof. He was accordingly then duly and legally elected to the exclusion of the said Alexander Boag. . . ."

Defences were lodged for the Society and for Alexander Boag, in which it was denied that the latter was in arrears with his subscriptions either at the date when he was appointed delegate or at the date when he was elected to the board of management. They also averred that Boag had been re-elected as a delegate at a meeting held on 25th April 1912.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia ;—(2) The defender the said Alexander Boag not being eligible to act as a delegate of the said Society, in respect that at the date of his pretended election as a delegate he was more than ten weeks in arrear with his subscriptions as a member of the said Society, his pretended election as a member of the board of management of said Society, as condescended on, was null and void, and decree of declarator and interdict should be granted as craved with expenses.

or an officer thereof . . . shall be decided in manner directed by the rules of the society or branch, and the decision so given shall be binding and conclusive on all parties without appeal, and shall not be removable into any Court of law or restrainable by injunction ; and application for the enforcement thereof may be made to the [Sheriff]. . . ."

June 19, 1913. The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) No jurisdiction. (2) No title. (3) No interest. (4) The action is incompetent. (5) The action is irrelevant.

M'Gowan v.
City of Glasgow
Friendly
Society.

On 13th June 1912 the Sheriff-substitute (Boyd) repelled the first five pleas for the defenders, and allowed a proof.

The defenders appealed to the Sheriff (Millar) who, on 20th July 1912, recalled the interlocutor appealed against, sustained the fourth plea in law for the defenders, and dismissed the action.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session, and the case was heard before the Second Division (without Lord Guthrie) on 18th and 19th June 1913.

Argued for the appellant;—The action was competent, and the pursuer was entitled to a proof of his averments. The pursuer did not now insist on the conclusion for declarator that he had been elected to the board of management. There was, therefore, no operative conclusion directed against the Society, and accordingly the rule in the case of *Gall*¹ had no application. The action was not excluded by the rule that disputes between the Society and a member "may" be determined by arbitration. In the first place the rule was permissive, and not imperative as in Melrose v. Trustees for Edinburgh Savings Bank.² "May" was only interpreted as "must" in Acts of Parliament where powers were conferred on public authorities to be exercised for the public benefit, as in the case of Gray v. St Andrews and Cupar District Committees of Fifeshire County Council.³ In the second place the rule did not apply to this case. It applied only to disputes about money matters, as appeared from the references to "the Small-Debt Court" and "the amount in dispute." Nor was this a dispute between the Society and a member "as such"; because the pursuer was not acting merely in his individual interest, but was vindicating the rules in the interest of all the members. But even if the rule was imperative and applicable to all disputes between the Society and a member, it could not oust the jurisdiction of the Court where the dispute arose with reference to an alleged infringement of the constitution committed by the Society.⁴ If the Society was in breach of the rules, it could not appeal to the rules to determine the manner in which the dispute should be settled. Unless the pursuer could come to the Court, he had no remedy, for the arbitrator could not make his award effective by interdict. It was not necessary to conclude for reduction of the minutes of the meetings at which Boag was appointed a delegate and a manager. It was Boag's election as a manager at a meeting of delegates which the pursuer sought to have declared void; he had no concern with what passed at the meeting of members at which he was elected a delegate, and there was no provision in the rules regarding the minutes of delegates' meetings as there was in the case of members' meetings. In any event the minutes were merely records of what passed at the meetings, and had nothing to do with the question of eligibility, which was the real question in dispute. The constitution of this Society had already been under the consideration of the Court in Wilkinson v. City of Glasgow Friendly Society.¹ The circumstance that since the action was brought Boag had, as was alleged, been duly re-elected as a delegate was irrelevant. The case must be decided on the state of the facts at the time when the action was brought.

Argued for the respondents;—The jurisdiction of the Court was excluded by the rule providing for the settlement of disputes between the Society and its members. This rule was passed under the provisions of the Friendly Societies Act, 1896.² Under these provisions the mode of settlement provided by the rules of any society was made applicable to all disputes without distinction, and all other modes of settlement were excluded. This disposed of the pursuer's objections both to the form and to the scope of the rule in question. In the circumstances the rule though permissive in form was imperative in effect.³ No doubt there were cases in which the actings of the Society could be brought under the review of the Court, as when it was admittedly acting in an unconstitutional manner.⁴ But, in the present case, this was denied, and the only question at issue was a simple question of fact, eminently suitable for arbitration, namely, whether or not Boag was in arrear with his subscriptions. The arbitrator's award could be made effective by the Sheriff in manner provided by the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, section 68 (1). Further the pursuer had mistaken his remedy. It was Boag's appointment as a delegate which he should have attacked, and to do so he required to reduce the minute of the meeting at which he was elected, for that minute was, under the rules, Boag's warrant to act as a delegate. Reduction of the minute of the delegates' meeting at which the board of management was elected was also necessary. Reduction was not competent in the Sheriff Court, and this was an additional argument against the competence of the action as laid. In any event, now that Boag had been duly re-elected, the action was one which no one had any interest to pursue, least of all the pursuer, who had abandoned his contention that he was entitled to be on the board of management in place of Boag.

LORD SALVESSEN.—In this case the pursuer seeks to have it declared that the pretended election of the defender Alexander Boag as a member of the board of management of the City of Glasgow Friendly Society was null and void ab initio, and he also seeks to interdict the Society and the trustees from summoning Mr Boag to meetings of the board of management. The ground of the application is that Mr Boag, at the date when he was elected a delegate to the Society, and also at the date when he was elected to the board of management, was not qualified according to the rules of the Society to act either as a delegate or as a member of the board of management. The particular disqualification averred is that Mr Boag was more than ten weeks in arrear with his subscriptions.

The Sheriff-substitute allowed a proof, but the Sheriff recalled his interlocutor and found that the case for the pursuer was incompetent as stated.

M'Gowan v.
City of Glasgow
Society.

June 19, 1913. I am unable to agree with the learned Sheriff in the view which he has taken or in the reasons by which he supports that view. The learned Sheriff seems to think that this is a domestic matter and that, as the Society has rules for settling disputes which rules have the sanction of the statute under which they are framed, an appeal to the Law Courts is incompetent. If this were a mere pecuniary claim by a member of this Society under his policy against the Society for payment of an amount which he alleged to be due, I have no doubt that these rules, at all events so far as concerns amounts below £12, would have been operative. Whether, if the sum were beyond £12, which was the statutory limit of the Small-Debt Court jurisdiction at the date when these rules were passed, there would be an obligation on the member to submit his pecuniary claim to the arbiter is a matter which we do not require, in the view I take of the case, to decide.

M'Gowan v.
City of Glasgow
Friendly
Society.

Lord Salvesen.

I think there is a great deal of force in the argument presented by Mr Moncrieff, that the rules are intended by statute to be exhaustive, and that when the statute says that every dispute is to be decided in the manner directed by the rules of the Society, the direction may be imperative although the rule is expressed in a permissive form. It is, however, I think quite unnecessary to deal with that matter, because we are not here concerned with a question which has arisen under these rules at all.

The question which the pursuer seeks to raise is a constitutional question. In the case of *Andrews and Others v. Mitchell*¹ it was held by the House of Lords that a member of a friendly society may competently raise such a question in the Law Courts, and indeed that the Law Courts form the only tribunal in which such questions can competently be raised. The point there was as to whether a friendly society had acted in accordance with its rules in expelling a member. If it had so acted, the Courts had no jurisdiction at all in the matter. If it had not so acted, it had acted unconstitutionally, and the decision was that the Courts were not merely not incompetent to entertain the complaint but were alone competent to do so. The matter was very tersely and clearly put by Lord Robertson² in the two sentences to which I drew attention during the argument. "The Act of 1896," he says, "has not given carte blanche to the tribunals of these societies to pronounce decisions which shall be exempt from examination in Courts of law. The decisions protected from review are constitutional decisions—decisions pronounced according to the rules, which, as we know, are registered under the Friendly Societies Acts." But the substance of the pursuer's complaint is that this Friendly Society has acted against its rules in that it has elected to its board of management a person who was not qualified to act. Accordingly in the case here the question is not one of those which are protected from review within the meaning of Lord Robertson's dictum; and I think the Law Courts are the only competent Courts in which the question can be tried.

I pause to say that it is very much in the interests of friendly societies that there should be this control by the Law Courts over any unconstitutional actings; otherwise I do not see how the members of these societies could be protected against boards of management, which, being once in the June 19, 1913. saddle, violated the rules under which they had been appointed to act. I can figure a case in which each and all of the members of a board of management had, since their election, become disqualified on one ground or another, and yet professed to manage the affairs of the society. Is that a matter to be determined by arbitration, or is it not rather to be determined by the Courts of the country, which exercise jurisdiction over all voluntary societies—a jurisdiction to the effect of seeing that they conform to the rules of their own constitution? So long as they act within the rules which they have laid down for themselves, and which form the contract between the society and its members, the jurisdiction of the Courts is excluded. When they violate these rules then the jurisdiction of the Courts may be invoked by any member of the society.

M'Gowan v.
City of Glasgow
Friendly
Society.
Lord Salvesen.

Accordingly, I think the present case does not fall under the special rule for settling disputes to which reference is made, and according to which either the Small-Debt Court, or, in special circumstances, a Court of arbitration, is, on the defenders' reading of the rule, the only competent tribunal for the decision of the question in dispute.

The only other point raised is as to whether as matter of form it was essential that the minute appointing Mr Boag as a delegate or the minute appointing him as a member of the board of management should be reduced. The Sheriff inclines to the view that reduction was necessary, and that as an action of reduction is not competent in the Sheriff Court the action should be dismissed. That is an extremely technical objection; but apart from its technicality, it appears to me to be unsound.

The minutes founded on by the defenders are not produced, and we do not know their terms, but according to the statement of them they are merely records of what took place at certain meetings. The first is a record of the election at the branch meeting of Mr Boag as the delegate for the branch. According to the rules evidence of such election is to be transmitted to the Society, and provision is made for the chairman of the meeting transmitting a minute stating who has been elected. As regards election to the board of management, there does not seem to be any provision that the proceedings fall to be recorded in a formal minute, and I suppose the election would have been quite good although no written record of it had been kept. In a properly managed society, of course, one would imagine that such a record would exist, from which it might be seen that those who were acting on the board of management had been duly elected after the proper procedure; but, again, that would be a mere record of what had taken place. It is not alleged that it is a certificate that each of the members so elected was qualified to act. But even if it had been so, I do not think it would have been in the least necessary that an action of reduction should be raised. As it was put in argument, the disqualification may have attached after the election was made whether as a delegate or as a member of the board of management.

Are the members as a whole, then, to have no remedy against unqualified persons acting on the board of management? If the argument of the defenders is worth anything it comes to this, that once duly elected, a delegate or a member of the board of management may disregard the rules of the June 19, 1913. Society and subject himself to various disqualifications, without any person having the right to call attention to the irregularity and to have the administration put upon a proper footing. The effective remedy which the pursuer seeks, and which he can obtain only from a Court of law and not from an arbiter, is an interdict against the person, who by the rules of the Society is disqualified from acting, continuing to act; and assuming that the pursuer establishes the disqualification as having attached to Mr Boag at the time that this action was brought, I see no reason why he should not get that remedy. We cannot consider what has taken place since. It may be that Mr Boag is now duly qualified; but the pursuer is entitled to have the judgment of the Court on the question whether his application was properly brought. It may be the best justification of the application that the Society has in consequence put its affairs upon a proper footing. It may no doubt affect the terms of the interdict, if any, which the Sheriff-substitute will pronounce; but it cannot affect the right of a party complaining of a departure from the rules by those who have the administration of the Society to have their conduct inquired into.

M'Gowan v.
City of Glasgow
Friendly
Society.
Lord Salvesen.

There may also be a question whether, assuming Mr Boag was not duly elected, the pursuer was not entitled to the position and the remuneration which Mr Boag has enjoyed. It is always open to a member of a voluntary society to claim damages against the society which has deprived him of patrimonial benefits by acting in violation of its own rules. The case of *Andrews*¹ is an illustration of that, because the pursuer there was suing for damages in respect of his expulsion from the society, on the ground that the expulsion had proceeded without his having received the written notice for which the rules provided.

On these grounds I am clearly of opinion that the Sheriff here has erred in dismissing the action, and that we should revert to the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD DUNDAS concurred.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, recalled the interlocutor appealed against, affirmed the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute dated 13th June 1912, remitted to him to proceed as accords, and found the pursuer entitled to expenses.

THE DIRECTORS OF THE CITY OF GLASGOW LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY No. 139.
AND THE DIRECTORS OF THE SCOTTISH UNION AND NATIONAL INSURANCE COMPANY, Petitioners.—Black. June 25, 1913.

Insurance—Insurance Company—Transfer of business—Petition to sanction proposed transfer—Intimation—Dispensing with transmission to policy-holders of documents relating to transfer—Assurance Companies Act, 1909 City of Glasgow Life Assurance Co.
(9 Edw. VII. cap. 49), sec. 13 (3) (b).

In a petition under the Assurance Companies Act, 1909, for sanction of the transfer of the business of a life insurance company to another insurance company, the petitioners craved the Court to dispense with the transmission of the documents specified in sec. 13 of the Act to the policy-holders of the transferee company, who numbered 30,000, in respect that the life insurance funds of the transferee company would not, under the transfer, become liable for the sums due under the policies of the transferring company, and that the transmission would cause considerable trouble and expense.

The Court dispensed with the transmission of the documents.

ON 24th June 1913 the directors of the City of Glasgow Life Assurance Company and the directors of the Scottish Union and National Insurance Company presented a petition under the Assurance Companies Act, 1909, and particularly section 13 thereof,* craving the Court to sanction the transfer of the whole business of the first of these Companies to the second, in terms of an agreement between them. 2D DIVISION.

The City of Glasgow Life Assurance Company (hereinafter referred to as the first Company) had carried on business since 1839, and was in 1913 registered as an unlimited Company under the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908. The capital stock of the Company was £600,000, divided into 24,000 shares of £5 each, on each of which £2, 10s. was paid up. The object and business of the Company were "the making and effecting of assurances on lives and survivorships, and making or effecting of all other kinds of assurance connected with life, the granting and selling of annuities either for lives or otherwise, and on survivorships, and the purchasing of annuities for lives or otherwise, the granting of endowments for children and other persons, the receiving of investments of money for accumulation, and the purchasing of contingent rights, whether of reversion, remainder, annuities, life policies, or otherwise."

* The Assurance Companies Act, 1909 (9 Edw. VII. cap. 49), enacts:—
Sec. 13. "(1) Where it is intended . . . to transfer the assurance business of any class from one assurance company to another company, the directors of any one or more of such companies may apply to the Court, by petition, to sanction the proposed arrangement. . . . (3) Before any such application is made to the Court . . . (b) a statement of the nature of the . . . transfer, . . . together with an abstract containing the material facts embodied in the agreement or deed under which the . . . transfer is proposed to be effected, and copies of the actuarial or other reports upon which the agreement or deed is founded, including a report by an independent actuary, shall, unless the Court otherwise directs, be transmitted to each policy-holder of each company in manner provided by section 136 of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, for the transmission to shareholders of notices not requiring to be served personally. . . ."

June 25, 1913.

City of Glasgow Life Assurance Co.

The business and objects of the Scottish Union and National Insurance Company (hereinafter referred to as the second Company) were "to carry on the business of life, fire, marine, and accident assurance; to grant and sell annuities of all kinds, and to grant and effect other assurances and contracts of guarantee or indemnity against any other description of loss or damage to property or person occasioned in any manner whatsoever." Its capital at the date of the petition was £5,103,000, divided into 248,250 "A" shares of £20 each, on which £1 per share had been paid up, and 13,800 "B" shares of £10 each, on which £3, 15s. per share had been paid up. By one of its private Acts this Company had power to take over the business of similar companies.

The petition further set forth:—"That in addition to its other insurance business the second Company carries on all the branches of business carried on by the first Company, and that by the proposed transfer of the whole of the business of the first Company to the second Company additional security will be afforded to the policyholders and annuitants of the first Company by the increased share capital and reserve funds. Further, the second Company will acquire a live organisation and connection which it can make use of in adding materially to its own life business to the advantage of its policyholders. Also the placing of the administration of the two Companies under one management will result in considerable economy. That as the result of negotiations between the boards of directors of the two Companies a provisional agreement was entered into between them, dated 5th and 6th March 1913, with an addendum thereto, dated 9th May 1913, by which the first Company agrees to sell and the second Company agrees to purchase on the terms therein mentioned the entire undertaking, business, goodwill, name, rights, and all other assets of the first Company, and that as at and from the 1st day of January 1913. A copy of said provisional agreement and addendum is produced herewith. That by the said provisional agreement it is provided that the contract between the said Companies should be conditional on (a) the value of the assets of the first Company being at the date thereof substantially as stated in the report to the first Company's shareholders issued in respect of the year ending 31st December 1912; (b) the liabilities of the first Company under its contracts of assurance and annuity as stated in the said report being confirmed by the report of the independent actuary required under section 13 (3) (b) of the Assurance Companies Act, 1909; (c) the shareholders of the first Company confirming said provisional agreement by a majority of not less than 75 per cent of the capital of the first Company not later than the 30th day of April 1913; (d) the transfer being approved by the shareholders of the second Company and confirmed by the Court, as required under section 13 (2) of the Assurance Companies Act, 1909, on or before the 30th November 1913." After stating that all these conditions, except the provision as to confirmation by the Court, had been satisfied the petition continued as follows:—"A statement of the nature of the transfer, together with an abstract containing the material facts embodied in the said provisional agreement and addendum, copy of the report of the first Company for the year ending 31st December 1912, upon which the said provisional agreement with its addendum is founded, copy of the actuarial report, dated 16th April 1913, on the proposed transfer by Mr Gordon Douglas as the independent actuary required by section 13 (3) (b) of the Assurance Companies Act, 1909, June 25, 1913. and a copy of the report of the second Company for the year ending 31st December 1912, have been transmitted to each policy-holder of the first Company, as well as to persons claiming to be interested in any policy who have given to the first Company notice in writing of such interest, all in terms of said section 13 (3) (b) of said Act. Lists of said policy-holders and persons, with affidavits as to the posting of the said documents and copies of the said documents are produced herewith.

"Notice of the intention to make this application was published in the Edinburgh, London, and Dublin Gazettes on 6th June 1913, and the said provisional agreement with its addendum remained open for the inspection of the policy-holders and shareholders of both Companies at their head offices in Edinburgh and Glasgow respectively for a period of fifteen days after the publication of the said gazette notice, in terms of section 13 (3) (c) of said Assurance Companies Act, 1909. A copy of each of said gazettes containing such notice is produced herewith.

"The present application for sanction is presented under and by virtue of the Assurance Companies Act, 1909, and particularly section 13 thereof. By virtue of subsection (3) (b) of the said section a statement of the nature of the proposed transfer, together with an abstract containing the material facts embodied in the said provisional agreement and addendum, and copies of the said report of the first Company for the year ending 31st December 1912, and of the actuarial report, dated 16th April 1913, on the proposed transfer by Mr Gordon Douglas as independent actuary as aforesaid, all as hereinbefore referred to, fall to be transmitted to the policy-holders of the second Company unless the Court otherwise directs. As it is provided by said provisional agreement that the life assurance and annuity fund of the first Company shall be kept separate and distinct, and as the life assurance and annuity funds of the second Company cannot in any way become liable for nor be affected by the sums due or to become due under the policies of the first Company, and as the transmission of the foresaid documents to the policy-holders of the second Company, about 30,000 in number, would cause considerable trouble and expense, it is humbly submitted that your Lordships should direct that the said transmission may be dispensed with. . . . It is the intention of the first Company to proceed by way of voluntary liquidation and a sale under the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908."

The petition, after craving intimation on the walls and in the minute-book, craved the Court "to direct that any transmission to the policy-holders of the Scottish Union and National Insurance Company foresaid of a statement of the nature of the transfer, together with an abstract containing the material facts embodied in the said provisional agreement and addendum thereto, and copies of said reports, may be dispensed with; and to allow all persons having interest to lodge answers hereto within eight days after such intimation and advertisement, if so advised; and on resuming consideration hereof, with or without answers, to sanction the transfer of the whole business of the said City of Glasgow Life Assurance Company to the second Company in terms of the said provisional agreement. . . ."

On the petition appearing in the Single Bills of the Second Division on 25th June 1913 counsel moved the Court to dispense with the

June 25, 1913. transmission of the documents as craved in the petition, and referred to Empire Guarantee and Insurance Corporation, Limited.¹

THE COURT (consisting of Lord Dundas, Lord Salvesen, and Lord Guthrie), without delivering opinions, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Appoint the petition to be intimated on the walls and in the minute-book in common form, and to be advertised twice in each of the Scotsman and Glasgow Herald newspapers: Dispense with the transmission to the policy-holders of the Scottish Union and National Insurance Company of a statement of the nature of the transfer, together with an abstract containing the material facts embodied in the provisional agreement and addendum thereto and copies of the reports, all referred to in the petition; and allow all persons having interest, if so advised, to lodge answers within eight days after said intimation and advertisements."

Reid v. James
Nimmo & Co.,
Limited. Expenses—Jury trial in Sheriff Court—Appeal—New trial—Expenses of appeal.

Where a verdict for the pursuer in a jury trial in the Sheriff Court was set aside on appeal to the Court of Session, and a new trial granted, on the grounds that the verdict had been erroneously applied and was contrary to the evidence, the Court found the pursuer liable in the expenses of the appeal.

2D DIVISION. PETER REID, pit bottomer, Standburn, Avonbridge, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Falkirk against James Nimmo & Company, Limited, coalmasters, Glasgow, for £260 as damages, under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, in respect of injuries sustained by him while working in their employment.

The case was tried before the Sheriff-substitute (Moffatt) and a jury on 26th February 1913. The jury returned a verdict containing findings in answer to the questions submitted to them, and assessing the damages due to the pursuer at £246, 7s.

On 28th February 1913 the Sheriff-substitute pronounced an interlocutor applying the verdict, and decerning against the defenders for the sum of £246, 7s.

The defenders appealed to the Court of Session, and moved for a new trial on the grounds (1) that the verdict had been erroneously applied, in respect that the findings of the jury did not warrant a verdict in favour of the pursuer; and (2) that the verdict was contrary to the evidence.

The case was heard before the Second Division (without the Lord Justice-Clerk) on 27th June 1913.

The Court having intimated that they would set aside the verdict and grant a new trial on the grounds stated for the appellants, counsel

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), Second Schedule, (17) (b)—A. S. 26th June 1907, sec. 17 (h)—Application for order on arbitrator to state case—Arbitrator's refusal to state question whether his findings in fact supported by the evidence led—Whether question one of law or fact.

A workman, dissatisfied with the arbitrator's statement of a case on appeal under the Workmen's Compensation Act, presented a note for an order upon the arbitrator to state a case, averring that certain facts, other than those stated by the arbitrator, had been proved, and that certain of the arbitrator's findings were contrary to the evidence, and proposing as one of the questions of law the question "Whether there was evidence led before the Sheriff-substitute which could competently support his findings of fact?" He did not aver that there was no evidence before the arbitrator upon which he could proceed to a decision of the case.

The Court refused the note, holding that it was in effect a request for the allowance of appeal upon a pure question of fact, upon which, under the Act, the arbitrator was final.

In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Glasgow, in which James Nelson, a seaman, claimed compensation from Allan Brothers & Company (United Kingdom), Limited, the Sheriff-substitute (Glegg) refused compensation, and, at the request of the workman, stated a case for appeal.

1st DIVISION.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

The case set forth:—

"The case was heard before me and proof led when the following facts were established:—

Nelson v.
Allan
Brothers & Co.
(United Kingdom),
Limited.

"(1) Appellant was in the employment of Allan Brothers & Company, Limited, on the s.s. 'Scandinavian' at a wage of 34s. 6d. per week. (2) On 2nd April 1912 while the ship was at Halifax appellant injured his left hand by falling on the deck. (3) In consequence thereof he was incapacitated for full work, and did light work until 11th April. (4) On 11th April, while the ship was at Boston, appellant went ashore, returned under the influence of drink, and engaged in a fight with quartermaster Miller. (5) At that time his hand was recovering from the injury, and if no further injury had been received it would have been completely recovered by 22nd April 1912. (6) Appellant's hand received further injuries in the course of the fight, and next day it was swollen and stiff and incapacitated him from work. (7) Appellant was kept on and paid wages until the end of the voyage on 22nd April 1912. (8) On 12th July 1912 appellant returned to and earned full wages at his previous employment. (9) Appellant's incapacity subsequent to 22nd April 1912 was not due to the original injury sustained on the 2nd but was due to the injury sustained in the fight on the 11th.

"I found in law that appellant's incapacity subsequent to 22nd April was not due to accident arising out of and in the course of his employment.

"I therefore assailed the respondents and found them entitled to expenses.

"The question of law for the opinion of the Court is:—Whether upon the facts stated it could competently be found that the appellant's incapacity subsequent to 22nd April 1912 was not due to accident arising out of and in the course of his employment."

The Sheriff-substitute appended to the case a certificate in these terms:—"I certify that I have refused to include in the foregoing stated case the following question which the appellant proposed I should submit in addition to the question of law therein stated, viz.:—'Whether there was evidence led before the Sheriff-substitute which could competently support his findings of fact?' The reason for my refusal was that this question was not raised by the facts proved."

Thereafter the appellant lodged a note for an order to state a case in which he averred that in the course of the proof the following facts had been established:—" . . . (b) That on 2nd April 1912, while the appellant was assisting to moor the ship in the harbour at Halifax, he slipped and fell on the deck and sustained injuries to his left hand through the lever of the anchor compressor falling on it while he was in that position. (c) That thereafter the appellant was treated daily by the medical officer of the ship for contusion of the left hand—especially of the third and fourth metacarpal bones. (d) That, as the result of the said injuries, the appellant was totally incapacitated for work until 11th April 1912. (e) That on 11th April 1912 the appellant engaged in a trifling scuffle with a quartermaster named Miller who had reprimanded him for being on shore. (f) That no report of the said scuffle was made to the master of the ship, no entry thereof was made in the official log, and the appellant received a very good discharge both as to conduct and ability at the end of the voyage. (g) That on the night of the 11th April 1912, after the said scuffle, the appellant's hand was in no worse condition than it had been before the scuffle took place. (h) That on 12th April the appellant resumed duty and worked all the way home doing light work. (i) That on the 13th April 1912, after the appellant had been at work for more than a day, his injured hand was dressed by the ship's doctor, who found that the swelling and stiffness had increased since he had last examined it. (j) That the doctor did not ask the appellant the cause of the increased stiffness but attributed it to the scuffle which he thought had taken place on the 12th April, his information being derived from the first officer who was informed by the fourth officer who had received his information from a man named Moore who was not examined as a witness. (k) That the appellant was paid wages till the end of the voyage on 22nd April 1912. (l) That, owing to the condition of his injured hand, the appellant was totally incapacitated for work between 22nd April and 12th July 1912." He prayed for an order upon the respondents to show cause why a case should not be stated by the arbitrator on the question of law which he had refused, as well as upon that which he had stated in the case, on the grounds (1) that the proposed questions were raised by the facts proved before the arbitrator, and (2) that certain findings in fact contained in the case which the arbitrator had stated were contrary to the evidence led before him.

Nelson v.
Allan
Brothers & Co.
(United Kingdom),
Limited.

Counsel were heard on 28th June 1913, before the First Division (without the Lord President), upon this note and upon answers which had been lodged for the respondents.

Argued for the appellant;—It was a question of law whether a finding in fact could reasonably be supported by the evidence led.¹ In considering such a question the Court were in a position analogous to that which they occupied when reviewing the verdict of a jury.² Such a question arose in the circumstances of this case, and the arbitrator was wrong in refusing to submit it for the determination of the Court. In any case, the Court should order the transmission of the process, so that they might be in a position to determine what was the effect of the evidence. If the Court considered itself bound in every case to accept the findings in fact of the arbitrator, there would in many cases be no means of preventing a miscarriage of justice.

Counsel for the respondents were not called on to reply.

LORD KINNEAR.—I think that this is a very clear case, and that we are not entitled to ask the Sheriff-substitute to state a case for the purpose of raising a question of fact and nothing else. The learned counsel for the appellant, who has argued the point very ingeniously, says that whether the Sheriff-substitute has found facts contrary to evidence is a question of law, and has always been so considered. That is not, in my opinion, an exact statement of the law. I think if a Sheriff-substitute has pronounced findings in fact which there was no evidence before him to enable him to find one way or the other, it is a question of law whether his award can stand. But that is not the kind of case which is made in this application, because the appellant begins his statement by saying that the Sheriff-substitute allowed a proof, "in the course of which the following facts were established," and accordingly he says that there was evidence laid before the Sheriff-substitute upon which it was his duty to find the facts in the appellant's favour. But if he could find one way, provided he thought it right, it was equally open to

June 28, 1913. him to find the other way if that was right. The statement simply comes to this, that there was a question of fact before the Sheriff, and that evidence was led, upon which he was invited to decide it. But then he had to decide it according to his own judgment, and we cannot listen to the complaint that he has decided it wrongly.

Nelson v.
Allan
Brothers & Co.
(United Kingdom),
Limited.

Now, if we are to review the Sheriff-substitute's judgment in these circumstances, we are simply entertaining an appeal upon a question of fact and nothing else. I do not think it would be possible to sustain this appeal without making the statutory limitation on this Court a dead letter. I am therefore for refusing the motion.

Lord Kinnear.

LORD JOHNSTON.—In dealing with appeals under this Act I think that the Court has probably gone already further than the Legislature intended, and that certainly we should not open the door any wider to appeals from the judgments of Sheriffs-substitute as arbitrators.

I agree with your Lordship that to accede to the demand of the appellant here would be to reduce the limitation of review to a dead letter. There are cases where it may be quite proper to remit to the Sheriff-substitute to reconsider facts, as, for instance, where the facts stated by him are not the facts which really raise the question which he puts, or where there are allegations upon the one side or the other that there were facts in the case which, were they stated, would allow the Court to dispose of some additional question of law. We should then certainly remit to the Sheriff-substitute and ask an explanation, or ask what was the state of the facts, or whether he was in agreement with the party demanding review as to the state of facts alleged by him.

But here we are not in that position. The position is that there is an absolute controversy between one of the parties and the Sheriff-substitute as to what the facts are. In that position the Sheriff-substitute is absolute master. He has found the facts, and to accede to the demand of the appellant here would really be allowing him to appeal or reclaim against a judgment on fact where the Sheriff-substitute holds one way and he happens to be disposed to hold another. In a case of that sort we cannot accede to the demand, which is really that we should instruct the Sheriff-substitute as to what facts he is to find.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I am very clearly of the same opinion. I think that Mr King Murray has said everything that could possibly be said on behalf of his client. The reason why he has failed to convince us is simply because of the plain terms of the Act of Parliament. We cannot interfere with the Sheriff-substitute on a question of fact, and the case states that proof was led and certain facts established. No statement has been made to us that no proof was led, or that there was no evidence before the Sheriff-substitute upon which he could proceed; but merely a statement that, upon the evidence that was before him, he has come to a wrong conclusion. I think it is out of the question that we should take the case up under these circumstances.

THE COURT refused the note.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), First Schedule, (1) (b) and (2) (c)—Average weekly earnings—Grade of employment—Change of grade—Appointment to work higher class machine dealing with finer material. Dalgleish v. Edinburgh Roperie and Sailcloth Co., Limited.

A girl in a rope and sailcloth factory, employed at a weekly wage of 7s. 6d. to work a drawing machine dealing with hemp which was afterwards spun into rope, was promoted to work, at a weekly wage of 8s., a drawing machine dealing with tow, a finer material which was afterwards woven into sailcloth. Five weeks after the change she was accidentally injured.

Held that the change was a change in the "grade" of her employment within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, First Schedule (2) (c), and that compensation fell to be calculated on the basis of her average weekly earnings for these five weeks.

IN an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, in the Sheriff Court of the Lothians and Peebles at Leith, at the instance of Mary Dalgleish against the Edinburgh Roperie and Sailcloth Company, Limited, the pursuer claimed compensation at the rate of 8s., or alternatively 7s. 6d., a week in respect of an accident sustained by her in the defenders' employment. The Sheriff-substitute (Guy) found that her average weekly earnings prior to the accident were 6s., and awarded compensation at that rate. At her request he stated a case for appeal.

1ST DIVISION.
 Sheriff of the
 Peebles.

The case set forth:—

"The following facts were admitted or proved. The appellant, who is fifteen years old, entered the employment of the respondents in January 1912. She worked in the department where hemp and tow, after being teased and carded by machinery, are drawn out by a drawing machine and thereafter twisted and filled into bobbins in a roving machine before being spun into twine or rope or woven into sailcloth. The work performed by the employees in said department consists in tending the machines and performing various duties connected therewith. The rate of wages paid to the female employees in the said department depends partly on the particular duty assigned to them and partly on the length of their employment and partly on the aptitude for their work which they may develop by experience. The employees have their duties assigned to them from time to time by the manager of the department. The appellant's duties at first were to act as one of a number of girls in removing bobbins, which had been filled with twisted yarn, from the roving machines to the spinning or weaving machines. She continued at this work till 23rd May 1912, her wage up to this time being at the rate 5s. 6d. a week. On 23rd May 1912 the appellant was assigned the duty of acting as signal girl at a wage of 6s. a week, her duty then being to give a signal to the other girls when bobbins were to be removed as aforesaid. On 1st June the appellant had assigned to her by the manager of the department the duty of operating a drawing machine where coarse yarn made from New Zealand hemp was drawn out, her wage then being raised to 6s. 6d. a week. On 17th October 1912 the appellant was appointed by said manager of the department to operate a drawing machine where finer hemp was dealt with, her wage for this work being raised to 7s. a week. On 14th November 1912 the appellant was appointed by said manager to work a drawing machine where a still finer hemp, called Russian hemp, was dealt with, her wage being raised to 7s. 6d. a week. The hemp dealt with at these three machines was afterwards spun into rope. On 5th December 1912 the appellant was appointed by the said manager to operate a drawing machine where a different and a finer quality of material, called B and C tow, was dealt with, her wage being raised to 8s. a week. This material, after being drawn, is woven into sailcloth. At each change in her duties as aforesaid the appellant's wages were increased as aforesaid. On 11th January 1913, while the appellant was engaged at said last-mentioned work and in receipt of said wage of 8s. a week, her right hand was caught in the machinery and crushed and cut. In consequence of said injuries the first finger of her right hand was afterwards amputated at the knuckle joint. She was and still is totally incapacitated for work as the result of said accident. During the twelve months previous to the accident the appellant's total actual earnings amounted to £15, 4s. 2d. . . . A statement showing the amount of the appellant's earnings and her work as appearing in the respondents' wages book is annexed hereto, and forms part of this stated case. In these books the only particulars given of the appellant's work is that it was classified under the description 'Preparing' from July 1912 up to 14th November 1912, and thereafter under the description 'Drawing frames (tow).' . . .

"I found in fact and in law that the various changes in the appellant's duties were not changes in the grade of her employment. . . . In these circumstances, I found that the average weekly earnings of the appellant prior to the accident were 6s. per week. I awarded her compensation at this rate. . . ."

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court included the following:—" (2) Was the change in the employment of the appellant from the work of removing bobbins to that of machinist a change in the grade of the employment of the appellant in the sense of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906? (3) Were the subsequent changes in the employment of the appellant, viz., the successive changes from the work of operating a drawing machine of a lower class to that of operating one of a higher class, changes in the grade of her employment in the sense of the said Act?" *

The appeal was heard before the First Division (without the Lord President) on 25th June 1913.¹

* The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), enacts, First Schedule (1) (b), that where total or partial incapacity results from an injury compensation shall be a weekly payment not exceeding a certain percentage of the average weekly earnings of the workman during the twelve months previous to the accident, "if he has been so long employed, but if not, then for any less period during which he has been in the employment of the same employer"; and further enacts, (2) (c), "employment by the same employer shall be taken to mean employment by the same employer in the grade in which the workman was employed at the time of the accident. . . ."

At advising on 4th July 1913,—

July 4, 1918.

LORD JOHNSTON.—The injured person in this case, who is the appellant, was a mill girl employed in a large rope and sailcloth factory in Leith. She entered the Company's employment in January 1912 when about fourteen years of age. From that date to 1st June 1912 she served as a beginner, at a wage of 5s. 6d. a week, very much in the position of a departmental message girl, carrying bobbins from one set of machines to another. But on 1st June 1912 the manager set her to the work of operating a drawing machine, where coarse yarn from New Zealand hemp was drawn, and increased her wages to 6s. 6d. a week. On three occasions, 17th October, 14th November, and 5th December 1912, she was moved to other drawing machines, where finer and still finer qualities of material were drawn, each time with an increase of 6d. of wages. From 5th December 1912 to 11th January 1913, or for a period of five weeks, she operated the last drawing machine to which she was assigned at a wage of 8s. a week. On 11th January 1913 she met with an accident, which wholly incapacitated her, at any rate for the time in question.

Edinburgh
Roperie and Sailcloth Co.,
Limited.

The Sheriff, after a proof, averaged the appellant's wages during the twelve months previous to the accident, and awarded her 6s. compensation accordingly. The question whether he was right in so doing depends upon the effect of paragraph (1) (b) as interpreted by paragraph (2) (a) and (c) of the First Schedule to the Act of 1906. Under paragraph (1) (b) the appellant is entitled to a weekly payment based on her average weekly earnings during the twelve months, if so long employed, but if not, then during any lesser period of employment by the same employer. Did the Act stop there, there is no doubt that the Sheriff would have been right in striking an average as he did. But then paragraph (2) says that for the purposes of the provisions of the Schedule relating to "earnings" and "average weekly earnings" the following rules shall be observed, viz., inter alia, "(c) employment by the same employer shall be taken to mean employment by the same employer in the grade in which the workman was employed at the time of the accident." Reading these words into paragraph (1) (b) what the Sheriff had to determine was, what was the grade in which the appellant was employed at the time of the accident, because upon the determination of this question depends the answer to the further question, whether the compensation is to be based on an estimate of the average wages for the twelve months previous to the accident, or for a shorter, and if so, for what period?

Was, then, the grade in which the appellant was employed at 11th January 1913 the same grade in which she had been employed during the past twelve months? or did any of the various changes made in the work on which she was employed amount to a change or changes in the grade of her employment in the sense of the Schedule?—in which latter case the average wage must be calculated on the wage not of twelve months but of a lesser period. I think that in this matter the nature of the employment has an all-important bearing. And in addition to summarising as above the information afforded by the case as to the changes in the appellant's work and wages, I should probably have read the Sheriff's further explanation of the circumstances of the employment, which is as follows:—"She worked

Ld. Johnston. in the department where hemp and tow, after being teased and carded by machinery, are drawn out by a drawing machine and thereafter twisted and filled into bobbins in a roving machine before being spun into twine or rope or woven into sailcloth. The work performed by the employees in said department consists in tending the machines and performing various duties connected therewith. The rate of wages paid to the female employees in the said department depends partly on the particular duty assigned to them and partly on the length of their employment and partly on the aptitude for their work which they may develop by experience. The employees have their duties assigned to them from time to time by the manager of the department."

Some employments have in them an element of the casual, and some of the seasonal as well as the casual in the ordinary sense, such as are illustrated in Perry v. Wright and the other cases reported at [1908] 1 K. B. 441; other employments are of a regular nature, where the employee is almost as much a part of the machinery of the establishment as the machine which he or she operates. In the former case a change of work by no means involves a change of grade of employment; in the latter case prima facie it much more readily does so. In the former case a rise or fall of wages, whether or not accompanied by a change of work, is no criterion of a change of grade of employment; in the latter a change of wages accompanied by a change of work goes very far to import such change of grade. There may be a change of department; there may be a change of the class of machine in the same department. A change of wages will not of itself import a change of grade; but if it accompanies a change of department, or a change of the class of machine, or even of the species within the same genus of machine, and is not temporary but reasonably permanent, I think that there is in the sense of the Schedule a change of grade. If so, then the appellant changed her grade of employment when on 5th December 1912 she was moved to a drawing machine drawing "a finer quality of material, called B and C tow," and her wages were raised to 8s. a week. And it is unnecessary to consider the effect of earlier changes.

There remains to consider the effect of paragraph (2) (a). On the assumption that the view I have expressed is correct, the basis of the compensation is the average wage of a period of about five weeks during which the appellant was employed in a grade in which she "was employed at the time of the accident." That is a comparatively short time. But paragraph (2) (a) says "average weekly earning shall be computed in such manner as is best calculated to give the rate per week at which the workman was being remunerated." Remunerated when? The manifest answer is at the date of the accident. But that answer must be read reasonably. It does not mean at the rate being earned on a casual job, without any reference to what I may call the industrial history of the workman during a more extended period. There are cases in which current earnings at the actual date of the accident do not give the rate, in the sense of the statute, "at which the workman was being remunerated," and accordingly the subparagraph under consideration provides "that where by reason of the shortness of the time during which the workman has been in the employment of his employer," (that expression being interpreted according to paragraph (2)

(c) "or the casual nature of the employment, or the terms of the employ- July 4, 1913.
ment, it is impracticable, at the date of the accident to compute the rate of remuneration, regard may be had" to outside considerations.

This provision, instead of creating any difficulty in the present case, con- Dalglish v. Edinburgh Roperie and Sailcloth Co., Limited.
firms, I think, the view which I have expressed. For, short as the time may have been, it was long enough to give a continuous and uniform rate of wages over more than a month. The work was as far as possible removed from the casual. Given good conduct, there was no ground for saying that the employment was not permanent with a prospect of a rise, as the word "permanent" is understood in relation to employment. But "the terms of the employment," by which I understand the circumstances of the employment in fact, as well as the conditions of the employment as a contract, strongly support the view that the computation of the average weekly earnings on the basis of the wages earned in fact at the date of the accident by this particular employee "is best calculated to give the rate per week at which" she "was being remunerated." Ld. Johnston.

I should therefore propose to answer question 3 to the effect that the change in the employment of the appellant on 5th December 1912 to the work of operating a drawing machine of a higher class was a change in the grade of her employment in the sense of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, and to find it unnecessary further to answer questions 2 and 3.

The case will have to go back to the Sheriff to assess the compensation, for though the average wage is by this judgment practically fixed at 8s., it does not follow that the compensation will be exactly that sum, as there may have to be certain allowances made.

I do not deal with the first question, as it was not argued on the footing of the view of the case which I have found myself called on to take.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I have had the opportunity of reading the opinion which has just been delivered by Lord Johnston, and I concur in it.

LORD KINNEAR.—I also agree.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find in answer to the third question of law that the change in the employment of the appellant on 5th December 1912 to the work of operating a drawing machine of a higher class was a change in the grade of her employment in the sense of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906; find it unnecessary to answer the other questions of law."

Reparation—Illegal apprehension—Arrest by constables without warrant of person "reasonably suspected of" crime—Privilege—Glasgow Police Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. cclxxiii.), sec. 88.

Issue—Illegal apprehension "without reasonable grounds of suspicion"—Malice and want of probable cause.

The Glasgow Police Act, 1866, sec. 88, empowers constables within the city to take into custody, without any other authority than the Act, any person "who is either accused or reasonably suspected of having committed" a penal offence.

In an action of damages for wrongous arrest brought against two Glasgow constables who had apprehended the pursuer without a warrant, the defenders maintained that, as they had bona fide suspected the pursuer of a crime and as, in their judgment, their grounds of suspicion were reasonable, they were protected by section 88 of the Glasgow Police Act and the action should be dismissed; or, otherwise, that if a trial were allowed, malice and want of probable cause must be put in issue.

Held (1) that it was a question for the jury whether the grounds of the defenders' suspicion were or were not reasonable, and that the pursuer was entitled to an issue; (2) that malice and want of probable cause need not be put in issue: and an issue whether the defenders "wrongfully and illegally, and without reasonable grounds of suspicion, apprehended the pursuer," approved.

Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

STEPHEN SHIELDS brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against James Shearer and John Bruce, police-constables, Glasgow, concluding for £100 in name of damages for wrongous apprehension.

The pursuer's averments were thus summarised in the note of the Sheriff-substitute (Lyell):—"The pursuer says that on 14th October 1912 he sold a watch to a general dealer in a shop in Glebe Street, Townhead, for 1s. 6d., and then walked in the direction of Stirling Road. While going along the road he was stopped by two police-constables, the defenders, who were then in plain clothes. They asked him what he had done with the watch, and he answered that he had sold it, and took them to the shop where he had disposed of it. He also explained that he purchased the watch on the previous Saturday from a hawker's barrow in Great Clyde Street, Glasgow. When the pursuer and defenders returned to the dealer's shop in question the woman in charge corroborated his story that he had sold her the watch, and informed the police that she was quite satisfied of the pursuer's honesty. In spite of this, however, and although no complaint of the theft of such a watch had been made to the defenders, they there and then apprehended the pursuer, marched him between them to St Rollox Police Office, and charged him with being in possession of a watch of which he was unable to give a satisfactory account. He was, accordingly, detained in custody for two days, and then discharged. Now, it is averred that the defenders had no warrant for this arrest, and prima facie it was, therefore, illegal."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The defenders, having illegally, unwarrantably, and without probable or any cause, apprehended the pursuer, taken him into custody, and detained and searched him as aforesaid, are liable to the pursuer for the loss, injury, and damage sustained by him. (2) The pursuer, having been wrongfully arrested by the defenders without a warrant, and on a charge which was false, and having been detained in prison in consequence thereof, is entitled to reparation for the loss thereby sustained, and for the injury to his feelings and reputation. (3) The actings of the defenders, as condescended on, having been malicious and without probable or any cause, they are liable to pursuer in reparation for the loss, injury, and damage sustained by him.

Shearer.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia :—(1) The action is irrelevant. (2) The defenders having been acting as police-constables in the honest discharge of their duties under the powers conferred upon them by the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, section 88,* without malice and with probable cause, are privileged.

The Sheriff-substitute having on 25th February 1913 allowed a proof, the pursuer required the cause to be remitted to the Second Division of the Court of Session.

The case was heard before the Second Division on 24th May and 7th June 1913, when the pursuer proposed the following issue for the trial of the cause :—“Whether on or about 14th October 1912 the defenders wrongfully and illegally apprehended the pursuer in or about Glebe Street, Townhead, and conveyed him to the St Rollox Police Office in Glasgow, to his loss, injury, and damage?”

Argued for the defenders :—The case should be dismissed, as there was nothing to suggest that the defenders had acted maliciously; or, at all events, malice and want of probable cause must be put in issue. The defenders in apprehending the pursuer were acting under the statutory warrant contained in section 88 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866. That section spoke of persons “reasonably suspected” of an offence, but it was plain that it was for the constables to determine whether the suspicion was reasonable. Where constables acted under the statute the presumption was that they were acting reasonably. It was settled by a series of cases¹ that, in actions against officials for wrongous apprehension, malice and want of probable cause must be put in issue, and a mere general averment that the defenders had acted maliciously would not entitle a pursuer to such an issue,² except in cases where the outrageous nature of the action complained of in itself indicated a malicious motive.³ The only cases in which malice and want of probable cause were not put in issue were Pringle v.

* The Glasgow Police Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. cclxxiii.), enacts :—Sec. 88. “It shall be lawful for the chief constable, or for any superintendent, lieutenant, or constable acting under or appointed by him . . . without any other authority than this Act, to do any of the following acts within but not beyond the city, viz : They may search for, take into custody, and convey to the police office any person who is either accused or reasonably suspected of having committed . . . a penal offence. . . .”

Bremner and Stirling,¹ which was distinguishable, as the defenders there had no warrant and no statutory authority for their action, and Harvey v. Sturgeon,² where not only were the proceedings complained of altogether unreasonable, but antecedent malice was also set forth in the record. In any event the decision in the latter case was inconsistent with all the previous decisions and should be reconsidered.

Argued for the pursuer;—The pursuer was entitled to an issue, and the issue proposed was in the form considered and approved in Pringle v. Bremner and Stirling,¹ Lundie v. MacBrayne,³ and Harvey v. Sturgeon.² A constable was not entitled to arrest a person without a warrant unless (a) the person was caught committing a crime, or (b) where information was given to the constable of a crime recently committed, or (c) where power to arrest without a warrant was conferred by statute. The defenders here relied on the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, but they could not plead that statute unless they had observed its conditions.⁴ On the terms of the statute the defenders must show not merely that they suspected the pursuer, but that they had reasonable grounds for doing so. This might appear at the trial, but at the present stage of the case it could not be determined whether the defenders were or were not entitled to invoke the statute. In *Lightbody v. Gordon*⁵ Lord President Inglis discussed the meaning of the terms "maliciously," and "without probable cause," and in Milne v. Smiths,⁶ Lord McLaren pointed out that the defence of "probable cause" was permitted only in a limited class of cases. The cases cited by the defenders were all distinguishable on the facts. On the other hand, *Harvey v. Sturgeon*² was precisely in point.

At advising on 4th July 1913,—

LORD SALVESSEN.—In this case the pursuer sues for damages in respect of an alleged illegal apprehension and detention in custody for a period of two days. The facts which he avers are so well summarised by the Sheriff-substitute that it is unnecessary to recapitulate them. The defenders, who are police-constables in Glasgow, maintained that the action was irrelevant, on the ground that their actings were privileged, and that there was no sufficient averment of malice. They attempted to distinguish the case from that on which the Sheriff-substitute had proceeded—Harvey v. Sturgeon,² and they further asked us to reconsider that decision and the issue which was there allowed. The importance of the decision from the point of view of the police force in Glasgow is no doubt great; and, speaking for myself, I should have been very willing to have submitted the case for consideration by a larger tribunal had I been satisfied on the fuller argument which has now been submitted to us that the previous decision was open to question. As, however, I have been confirmed in the view that the decision was right, I see no reason why we should take this course.

There is a distinction between the facts in the case of *Harvey*² and those averred here that is not without some force. No charge was made against July 4, 1913. the pursuer Harvey after he had been brought to the police office; whereas ^{Shields v.} in the present case the pursuer was charged before a magistrate with being ^{Shearer.} found in possession of a watch of which he was unable to give a satisfactory ^{Lord Salvesen.} account. He was remanded on the first occasion for inquiry; and when he was brought up next day before the magistrate officiating in the Police Court he was discharged. The fact that the present pursuer was brought up before a magistrate and that a definite charge was made against him may have a bearing on the defence, but does not necessarily lead to the conclusion that he has not stated a relevant case.

The main foundation of the action is that the pursuer was apprehended without a warrant. At common law such an apprehension is prima facie illegal except in certain well-defined cases. If a policeman has seen an offence committed or "has such evidence as is equivalent to personal observation" (to use the words of Lord M'Laren in *Lundie v. MacBrayne*¹) he is, of course, entitled to apprehend the accused and bring him before a magistrate. No such special circumstances occur here. According to the pursuer's allegation he had simply on the day of his apprehension sold to a broker a watch which he had purchased some days before; and even the defenders do not say that they personally observed or had been informed that he had committed an offence. At common law therefore the apprehension of the pursuer was prima facie an illegal act.

The defenders, however, appeal to section 88 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, which provides that police-constables may within but not beyond the city "search for, take into custody, and convey to the police office any person who is either accused or reasonably suspected of having committed either within the city or at any place whatsoever beyond the city a penal offence." As the pursuer's apprehension took place within Glasgow, it is obvious that his arrest by police-constables without a warrant is not necessarily an illegal act. If the person apprehended by them is reasonably suspected of having committed a penal offence they are protected although it may be proved that he was entirely innocent. The defenders' counsel maintained that the question of reasonableness is one entirely in the judgment of the police-constable who effects the arrest, and that therefore he is privileged if he did not act maliciously. I cannot so construe the language of the section. Such a construction gives no effect whatever to the word "reasonably"—a word which is carefully inserted in this and most of the succeeding clauses of the same section which deal with similar powers conferred upon police-constables. I think the section does not empower a police-constable to arrest any person merely because he bona fide suspects that person of having committed a penal offence. Such a suspicion, although honestly entertained, may be entirely without reasonable ground; and I think it would be remarkable if a police-constable were to have the same absolute protection in arresting a person without a warrant which he undoubtedly enjoys when he is effecting an arrest in pursuance of a proper warrant. Apart from the case of Harvey,² which raised a similar question under somewhat different circumstances, there is no authority upon the

July 4, 1913. point. In the case of *Young*¹ the constables against whom an issue was allowed had acted under the same section of the Glasgow Police Act of 1866, but under a clause which does not say anything about reasonable ground of suspicion. In the argument it was, moreover, admitted that the words "maliciously and without probable cause" must be inserted in the issues directed against the constables. The form of the issue was therefore not considered, and the only question argued was whether the facts and circumstances averred were such that malice could be inferred from them. The case is therefore no authority for the proposition that police-constables enjoy an absolute privilege when acting in the bona fide discharge of what they believe to be their duty, a privilege which could not be displaced by a mere averment that they acted without probable cause, but only by averments from which it might reasonably be inferred that they were actuated by some illegitimate motive. On the other hand, in the case of *Lundie v. MacBrayne*² an issue was allowed in respect of an alleged illegal apprehension without malice and want of probable cause being inserted in the issue, although there, as here, a statutory warrant was pleaded as justifying the conduct complained of. In order to allow the defenders the protection of the enactment on which they rely it must be shown that they acted within its terms; in other words, that they had reasonable grounds of suspicion for taking the pursuer into custody. The reasonableness of their conduct is a matter for the jury, and does not depend entirely on the bona fides of the defenders. If it were otherwise every citizen might be exposed to arrest without any remedy, simply because a constable de facto harboured a suspicion against him of having committed some penal offence, however stupid and unreasonable such suspicion might be.

It does not, however, follow that we should adopt the form of issue which was allowed in the case of Harvey.³ No discussion took place there as to the form, except as to whether malice and want of probable cause should be inserted. What happened was that the pursuer's counsel called attention to the case of Pringle v. Bremner,⁴ where the House of Lords thought that the words "wrongfully and illegally" only should go into the issue. That, however, was not a case where any protection was afforded to the constables by statute. As regards one of the wrongs, namely, the arrest and imprisonment of the pursuer without a warrant, the Lord Chancellor (Lord Chelmsford) made the following observations: "But then, it is said, the constable having discovered matters which, in his judgment, brought home to the pursuer complicity in the alleged crime, he was justified in exercising his discretion upon the subject, and in apprehending the pursuer and lodging him in prison. Again, I say, answering in the same way as I answered with regard to the searching for papers, the result will either justify him or will not justify him; if the papers he seized really proved or gave a fair and reasonable ground to believe that the pursuer was implicated in the grave crime which was charged, then, although the officer might have had no warrant for his apprehension (and he had no warrant upon this occasion), yet the event would justify him and he would protect himself by the circumstances afterwards discovered." In other words, as I July 4, 1913. read the passage, the constable who arrests a person without a warrant takes the risk of justifying the apprehension. Shields v. Shearer.

Here it is not alleged that the pursuer had in fact committed the crime with which he was charged, but looking to the provisions of the statute this is, I think, not necessary to justify the constables. It is enough if the jury think that they did not act without reasonable grounds of suspicion, and it is important that this should be put pointedly in issue rather than explained, as it might be, by the Judge at the trial. The presumption is that the officer acts in pursuance of his duty, and the pursuer must rebut this presumption. I propose, therefore, that the issue which we allow should be expressed as follows: "Whether on or about 14th October 1912 the defenders wrongfully and illegally, and without reasonable grounds of suspicion, apprehended the pursuer," and so on, as in the form proposed. It is said that this is a departure from the stereotyped form, and that the Court ought to be slow to introduce any novelties into the forms of issue. I assent generally to that view, but each issue must be adjusted according to the particular circumstances of the case, and there is no authority which settles conclusively the form of issue where a police-constable effects an arrest without a warrant but acting under statutory authority. It is obvious that the pursuer cannot succeed unless he convinces the jury that the defenders had no reasonable cause to suspect him of the crime charged, and it is desirable that officers of the law should as far as possible be protected in the discharge of their duty by the grounds of liability being pointedly brought under the notice of the jury. Lord Salvesen.

LORD DUNDAS.—I agree that an issue ought to be allowed in the terms suggested by Lord Salvesen, and that substantially upon the grounds he has so fully explained. I have had an opportunity of reading his opinion, and I add nothing more.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD GUTHRIE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of Lanarkshire, dated 25th February 1913: Vary the issue by adding after the word 'illegally' in the second line thereof the words 'and without reasonable grounds of suspicion,' and with this addition approve of the said issue . . ."

Succession—Testament—Construction—Liferent or right of occupancy of house—Incidence of burdens—Fee and liferent.

A testator, in bequeathing the residue of his estate in shares to his son in fee and to his daughters and their issue in liferent and fee respectively, expressed the desire that his children so long as they remained unmarried should live together in his house; and directed his trustees when either his son or all his daughters should be married, whichever of these events should first occur, to convey the house to his son. He also declared that, as his unmarried daughters would on the son's marriage be deprived of a residence, the son should thereupon pay to each unmarried daughter an annuity of £50, terminable on marriage.

Held that the unmarried children had a mere right of occupancy, and not a liferent, of the house; and therefore were not liable in payment of any annual burdens and charges thereon beyond those payable by a tenant occupier.

2D DIVISION. JAMES B. MONTGOMERIE-FLEMING of Kelvinside, Glasgow, died on 18th June 1899 leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 4th February 1898.

By this trust-disposition and settlement the testator conveyed his whole estate to trustees, and, after directing payment of the expenses of the trust and of his debts, directed the trustees to hold the residue of the estate for behoof of his widow in liferent allennarily, the liferent to terminate in case of her entering into a second marriage. The fourth purpose of the trust-disposition and settlement was in the following terms:—"It is my wish and desire that on the death or second marriage of my said wife my children should, so long as they remain unmarried, live together at Kelvinside House,* Kelvinside: And further, as it is my wish and desire that my son, James Brown Montgomerie-Fleming junior, should occupy Kelvinside House on his marriage, I hereby direct and appoint my said trustees, on the death or second marriage of my said wife, if and when the whole of my daughters are married or when my son is married, whichever of these latter events shall first happen, to assign and dispone to" his son Kelvinside House and certain adjacent subjects, "but that under such burdens as may at the date of my death exist over the said subjects: Declaring that as my unmarried daughters will on my son's marriage and entry to and occupation of Kelvinside House and pertinents before mentioned, be deprived of a residence at Kelvinside House, I provide and declare that my son if and when my unmarried daughters are so deprived of a residence at Kelvinside House shall be bound and obliged, as by acceptance of the foresaid conveyance in his favour of Kelvinside House and others before mentioned he shall be held to bind and oblige himself, to make payment to each of my unmarried daughters till each of them shall respectively be married of a free yearly annuity of £50," and it was declared "that if and when each July 4, 1913. of my daughters shall be married the annuity of the daughter so getting married shall cease as at the date of such marriage." By the fifth purpose of the trust-disposition and settlement the trustees were directed to "hold, apply, convey, and make over" the whole residue of the estate to the testator's son to the extent of two-sixth shares, and to each daughter one-sixth share, the share falling to the son to be paid and conveyed by the trustees to him in fee, and the shares falling to the daughters to be held and applied for them in liferent alienably and for their respective children in fee.

Montgomerie-
Fleming's
Trustees v.
Carre.

The testator was survived by his wife, who died on 14th February 1913, and by a son and four daughters, who were all unmarried at the date of his death.

The annual charges in respect of Kelvinside House, viz., the annual interest (which was, less tax, £178, 18s. 4d.) on a bond and disposition in security over it, the feu-duty, the annual premiums of fire and owners' liability insurances over the house, the annual landlord's taxes and assessments, and annual repairs, amounted to approximately £276, 0s. 6d.

Questions having arisen, inter alia, as to the nature of the right of unmarried children in Kelvinside House under the fourth purpose of the trust-disposition and settlement, and as to the incidence of the above-mentioned annual charges, a special case was presented to which the testator's trustees were the first parties; three of the testator's daughters, who had married after his death, and their husbands were the second parties; the son, who was unmarried, was the third party; and an unmarried daughter was the fourth party.

The first and second parties maintained that the third and fourth parties were entitled to a liferent use and enjoyment of Kelvinside House until the marriage of either, and were bound, in addition to the annual charges and burdens payable by an occupier, to free and relieve the trust-estate of the payment of the above-mentioned annual charges. The third and fourth parties maintained that they were entitled to a mere right of occupation of Kelvinside House till the marriage of either, free of the above-mentioned annual burdens, and on payment only of the usual annual charges falling to be paid by a tenant occupier.

The following question of law was, inter alia, submitted:—" (2) Are the third and fourth parties entitled to have (a) the liferent use and enjoyment of Kelvinside House and pertinents until the marriage of either, or (b) a mere right of occupation of Kelvinside House until the marriage of either?" By the third and fourth questions the opinion of the Court was desired as to whether the third and fourth parties were bound to pay until the marriage of either the above-mentioned annual charges.

The case was heard before the Second Division (without the Lord Justice-Clerk) on 24th June 1913. At the debate the undernoted cases were referred to.¹

Montgomerie-
Fleming's
Trustees v.
Carre.

LORD DUNDAS.—[After referring to the circumstances in which the case was presented]—By the second question we are asked, “Are the third and fourth parties entitled to have (a) the liferent use and enjoyment of Kelvinside House and pertinents until the marriage of either, or (b) a mere right of occupation of Kelvinside House until the marriage of either?” In my opinion, we should answer head (a) in the negative and head (b) in the affirmative. As matter of fair and reasonable construction of the language of the settlement, according to the natural and ordinary meaning of the words used, I think the testator did not intend to create a right of “liferent” in the strict legal sense, but intended that the house and pertinents should be used as a home or residence where his unmarried children should live together so long as any of the daughters remained single, and until the son should marry. They were to occupy the house, but I do not think they could have let it. The testator evidently viewed this as a valuable privilege to his unmarried daughters, for, in the event of any of them being “deprived of a residence” in Kelvinside House by his son’s marriage and entry to the premises, the son was taken bound to pay each of his unmarried sisters a compensatory allowance of £50 a year until she should marry. It does not seem consistent with this idea, when one looks at some of the figures disclosed in the case, that the unmarried children should, during their occupancy of the house, have to bear the full legal burdens which would attach to proper liferenters. I do not think the mere fact that the occupation was not intended necessarily to subsist during the whole lives of the daughters, but only until marriage, is in itself sufficient to negative the theory of a proper liferent—cf. Glover’s Trustees v. Glover.¹ On the other hand, one observes that the property is to be conveyed to the son, if he marries, “under such burdens as may at the date of my death exist over the said subjects.” As matter of construction, I have no difficulty in affirming that the testator’s intention must be held to have been to give a right of occupation, and not of proper liferent use and enjoyment, to his unmarried children.

The cases to which we were referred seem to me to support this view. Each case of the kind must, of course, depend upon the particular terms of the settlement under consideration. But some light may be obtained from the decisions, especially from the recent judgment of the House of Lords in Johnstone v. Mackenzie’s Trustees,² reversing the decision of this Division.³ “Two propositions of general import” were there stated by Lord Shaw,⁴ who delivered the only opinion of the House. “First, the extent of the obligations attaching to a right of this character conferred by deed or settlement is a question to be determined by the intention of the maker, as that intention can be derived from the language which he has employed, and from the provisions which he has made with regard to, inter alia, the administration and realisation of his estate. Secondly, when the language employed is entirely apt and appropriate for the creation of an ordinary liferent right, it rests upon those who contend that the ordinary obligations which attach to a liferenter should not apply to him in the particular case— July 4, 1913. it rests upon those putting forward such a proposition of exception to establish it.” The language of this settlement does not, in my opinion, comply with the test of being “entirely apt and appropriate for the creation of an ordinary liferent.” It is significant that no case was cited, and I am not aware that there is any, where an ordinary liferent has been held to have been created without the words “liferent use and enjoyment,” or words of clearly similar import and effect. As regards Lord Shaw’s first proposition, I have already indicated the reasons which lead me to think that the testator’s intention was not to create a liferent, but merely to give a right of occupation. It was argued that, upon that footing, there would here be no fund from which the trustees could satisfy the burdens from which, ex hypothesi, the occupiers were intended to be freed. I do not think this is so. The trustees have, in point of fact, the whole residue in their hands. They are bound to retain two-thirds of it for behoof of the daughters in liferent alimentary and their issue in fee. Even as regards the son’s one-third of the residue, I see no reason to doubt that, if he called upon the trustees to pay it over to him—which he has not yet done, and I gather that there are practical reasons which make it improbable that he will do so—they would be entitled to retain, as against his demand, a portion of his share sufficient to meet one-fifth of the burdens affecting the occupation of the premises in question. This is not, therefore, a case such as Lord Shaw figures¹ where “the residue is in fact distributed and the fund available for disbursements of trust charges is gone.”

I am not sure whether the actual judgment of the First Division in *Smart’s Trustees*² can be regarded as authoritative since the decision of the House of Lords in Johnstone’s case.¹ It was laid before that House in the argument, but is not specially referred to in Lord Shaw’s opinion. Assuming, however, that the decision in *Smart’s Trustees*² has been overruled, I see no reason to doubt that Lord Dunedin’s observations upon the point I am dealing with are sound law; and they seem to be apposite to this case. His Lordship said³: “It seems to me that the construction of the direction to the trustees to allow the lady the use of the house cannot be altered by the fact that they are told to divide the residue. Whether trustees, as a matter of fact, should retain part of the residue in order to meet these burdens is a question for themselves, and a question of circumstances. I cannot see how the mere existence of a direction to divide the residue can possibly affect the true construction of a direction that you are to give a certain person one thing or another.”

LORD SALVESEN.—The substantial question in this case is whether under the fourth purpose of the testator’s trust-disposition and settlement his unmarried children were given a proper liferent of the house in which he resided at his death, or merely a personal right of occupation. In the former event, according to the decision of the House of Lords in Johnstone v. Mackenzie's Trustees,¹ the burdens on the property fall to be paid by the liferenters; in the latter event the burdens fall to be borne like any other annual debt affecting the trust-estate out of the income before distribution of the surplus amongst the beneficiaries.

It was argued for the first and second parties that the present case is ruled by the decision in Johnstone v. Mackenzie's Trustees.¹ With every desire to follow loyally the views laid down by the House of Lords (which indeed I should myself have given effect to in that case had I not conceived myself bound by a chain of previous decisions) I have found myself unable to assent to this view. The dominant consideration is the intention of the testator as it can be gathered from the language of the instrument. Here there are no words constituting a liferent. The testator simply expressed his desire that his children so long as they remained unmarried should live together at Kelvinside House. He plainly regarded this as a privilege, because he provides in a later clause that, in the event of his daughters being deprived of a residence there in consequence of the direction to the trustees to make over the house to his son on his marriage, the latter was to pay each of them a free yearly annuity of £50 so long as they remained unmarried. In a rough way, accordingly, he valued the privilege to each of his unmarried daughters of residing in the house at £50; whereas, in the event, which has happened, of there being only two children in a position to take advantage of the privilege, the cost of occupation approximates £150 for each if they are to bear the annual burdens afflicting to the property. These burdens all existed at the time when the will was drawn; and that the testator had them fully in view is plain from the express provision which he makes that the conveyance in favour of his son when it comes to be made is to be "under such burdens as may at the date of my death exist over said subjects."

Further, if the view of the first and second parties be well founded, it must be assumed that the testator intended that the right of occupation should become more burdensome as the numbers of those entitled to occupy diminished. If all the children had remained unmarried no practical question would have arisen as to the source from which the burdens were to be provided; but as soon as one daughter married and left the family home, a conflict of interest would at once arise. It can scarcely be maintained that the testator did not contemplate the successive marriages of his daughters; and, if while they all resided in family together the burdens were borne equally, it is difficult to suppose that, whenever one left to make her home with her husband, a new system should be inaugurated. The daughter who married no longer required the family home as a residence; and it is not unreasonable to suppose that the testator did not desire the children who remained in occupation to have their position thereby changed for the worse. All these circumstances lead me to the conclusion that it was not the testator's intention that his unmarried children should pay for the privilege of residing together in the family home.

Is there, then, anything in the other provisions of the trust settlement

which tend to a contrary result? It was said that the residue clause, while July 4, 1913. it provides for the trustees holding the daughters' shares and paying them only the annual income, gives the testator's son the right to demand payment of his share of the residue; and that there is thus no fund out of which the burdens can annually be met. I think there is a plain fallacy here. If what is conferred upon the unmarried children is a mere right of occupancy, then the annual burdens on the property, so long as it is held by the trustees, are debts due by the trust-estate which must be provided for pro tanto before the son's share of residue is paid over. The circumstances of this case are entirely different from those which influenced the judgment in Johnstone v. Mackenzie's Trustees.¹ The only sum which remained undistributed in the latter case was the £20,000 expressly set aside to provide an annuity. The capital of this sum was conveyed to another set of beneficiaries, and the surplus revenue after payment of the annuity was specially destined. There is nothing of the kind here, and I respectfully concur in the opinion of Lord President Dunedin in the case of Smart's Trustee v. Smart's Trustees,² where he says:—"It seems to me that the construction of the direction to the trustees to allow the lady the use of the house cannot be altered by the fact that they are told to divide the residue. . . . I cannot see how the mere existence of a direction to divide the residue can possibly affect the true construction of a direction that you are to give a certain person one thing or another."

Lord Salvesen.

The above considerations lead me to the conclusion that the right conferred on the unmarried children of the testator was not a proper liferent but a personal privilege, and that this case is ruled by the decision in the case of Clark,³ which was approved by the House of Lords. There are other considerations pointing in the same direction. It is an inherent quality of a true liferent of a heritable subject that the liferenter need not occupy it, but is entitled to let it and to draw the rents. This cannot be affirmed of a right to occupy a house which is shared by others. So long as one of the privileged class wishes to occupy in person, obviously the others could not let their right of occupation to third parties. This would be to defeat the purpose of the testator, which was to provide a joint residence for his unmarried children. The right is a purely personal one; and if none of them desire to exercise it the result would seem to be that the trustees could let the house for the benefit of the trust-estate. Moreover, it is not a privilege that is primarily intended as lasting during life. I do not say that a bequest of the liferent use of a dwelling-house to a person so long as he or she remained unmarried would not have the qualities of a true liferent. It might subsist during the whole of the legatee's life; but the testator here, I think, really contemplated that the right of occupation would cease during the lifetime of all or most of his children. It would only not do so if his son or one or more of the latter's sisters did not marry. If the son married, or all the daughters, the right of occupation would equally come to an end. I am therefore of opinion that head (a) of the second query falls to be answered in the negative and head (b) in the affirmative.

[His Lordship then dealt with the other questions in the case.]

LORD GUTHRIE.—I am of the same opinion. This case has evidently been brought in order to settle the question which is raised in the second query. It was admitted that no case has hitherto occurred in which the use, permanent or limited, of a house has been held to come within the category of liferent use and enjoyment without the use of the word "liferent." It was not maintained that there might not be an equivalent expression which might be conceived leading to the same result. In the absence of the word "liferent" are there any equivalents to be found in the trust-disposition and settlement? I can find none; and I conclude both from the words of the will and from the surrounding circumstances of the testator and his family that only a right of occupancy was intended. The testator talks of his unmarried daughters being "deprived of a residence" at Kelvinside House; and, as I understand, what he gave them was a residence at Kelvinside House and nothing more. That seems to me to be quite on the same lines as the expression in the case of Clark,¹ "use of my house," which was held only to give a mere right of occupancy.

THE COURT answered head (a) of the second question in the negative, and head (b) in the affirmative, and questions three and four in the negative.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), First Schedule (16)—Review—Minor workman—Probable earnings at date of review—General rise in wages—Agreement fixing probable earnings at prior date—Rise in wages between date of agreement and date of review.

The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, First Schedule (16), provides, with regard to review of weekly payments, that "where the workman was at the date of the accident under twenty-one years of age and the review takes place more than twelve months after the accident, the amount of the weekly payment may be increased to any amount not exceeding fifty per cent of the weekly sum which the workman would probably have been earning at the date of the review if he had remained uninjured, but not in any case exceeding one pound."

The compensation payable to a minor workman was fixed by agreement at a weekly sum representing half the amount which, in the opinion of the parties, he would have been earning at the date of the agreement had he remained uninjured. Some months afterwards, in consequence of a general rise in wages, he applied to the Sheriff to have the compensation increased.

Held that the fact that there had been a general rise in wages between the date of the agreement and the date of the application did not per se entitle the workman to an increase, but that it was merely one of the items to be taken into consideration by the Sheriff in determining for himself the weekly sum which the workman would probably have been earning at the date of the review if he had remained uninjured.

The case set forth :—

"The appellant, who was born on 13th January 1893, received injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment with the respondents on 2nd September 1907, since which date he was totally incapacitated for work up to the date of the application to review.

"The appellant whose average weekly earnings prior to his accident were 13s., was paid compensation at the rate of 10s. per week from the date of his accident to 19th January 1912, when the rate was by agreement increased to 12s. 6d. per week on the ground that if he had remained uninjured the appellant would probably have been earning 25s. per week.

"The present application, which was presented on 23rd September 1912, is to have said compensation of 12s. 6d. increased to 17s. 6d. per week on the ground that but for his accident the appellant would have been able to earn at least 35s. per week. The appellant averred that he would have been fit to do any work in connection with the pit which a young man of his age and intelligence, and with the experience and skill he would have possessed but for the accident, could have got. In particular, he contended that he would in all probability have been employed at the face, earning from 6s. 6d. to 8s. a shift, and that he could also have been working as a brusher earning 7s. to 8s. a shift, or as a fireman or repairer earning an average of 6s. 6d. a shift.

"The case was heard before me on 14th November 1912 and 13th January 1913, and on 22nd January 1913 I found as follows :—(1) That the appellant is at present in receipt of compensation from the respondents by agreement dated 19th January 1912 at the rate of 12s. 6d. per week. (2) That said compensation is based on an earning power of 25s. per week as the weekly sum which the appellant would probably have been earning at the date of the agreement, if he had remained uninjured. (3) That it was not proved that the earning capacity of lads of nineteen years of age exceeds 25s. per week, and that there was nothing in the evidence which made me think that the appellant would have earned more than other lads of his own age. (4) That the appellant has failed to prove that his earning capacity at the date of the application to review would probably have increased since said 19th January 1912 if he had remained uninjured.

"It was maintained in argument that I was bound to increase the claimant's compensation because there had been a general increase in miners' wages in the district of 9d. per shift between the date of the agreement and the date of the arbitration. I held this increase in miners' wages to be proved as a fact in the case, but refused to give effect to the argument for these reasons, viz. :—(a) Although in the case of a workman who has been injured while under the age of twenty-one mere lapse of time apart from any change in his actual physical capacity may be considered as such a change of circumstances as to entitle him to have the rate of compensation reviewed, yet a rise or fall in the rate of wages, being dependent on the conditions of the labour market, was to be regarded exactly in the same way in the case of a minor workman as in that of one of full age, and I held that it could not be considered as a change of circumstances which entitled either party to have the compensation reviewed. (b) Apart from the agreement of 19th January 1912 I found that it was not proved that the claimant's earning capacity would probably, but for the accident, have exceeded 25s. at the date of the arbitration.

"I accordingly refused the crave of the minute for review."

The question of law for the opinion of the Court was:—"Was I right in refusing to consider the general increase of 9d. a day in the miners' wages between the date of the agreement (19th January 1912) and the date of the application to review, as entitling the claimant to increase in compensation?"

The appeal was heard before the First Division (without the Lord President) on 25th June 1913.

Argued for the appellant;—The arbitrator was wrong in refusing to consider that in the circumstances of this case the rise in the rate of wages entitled the appellant to the increase which he asked. His earning capacity in January 1912 was 25s. per week. It followed that it had been increased since that date by an amount proportionate to the general rise. It was not contended that a rise in the rate of wages was a circumstance that per se entitled the workman to an increase of compensation, but it was a circumstance which was relevant and must be taken into consideration in arriving at the man's wage-earning capacity at the date of review.¹ The arbitrator had expressed the opinion in his finding (a) that a rise or fall in the rate of wages was to be regarded exactly in the same way in the case of a minor workman as in that of one of full age, that is to say, whether he was dealing with an application under paragraph (3) or with one under paragraph (16) of the First Schedule.* Now, it had been held, in the first two cases cited, that the circumstance of such a rise or fall was one which the arbitrator was bound to consider in proceeding under paragraph (3), and therefore, if he was right in the opinion referred to, it followed that he was bound to apply the same considerations in proceeding under paragraph (16). The provisions of these two paragraphs might quite properly be read together as applying to the present application. But, in any case, looking at the terms of paragraph (16) by themselves, it was clear that the arbitrator could not ascertain "the weekly sum which the workman would probably have been earning at the date of review if he had remained uninjured" July 4, 1913. without taking into consideration all the relevant circumstances, including the rate of wages and any rise or fall therein. The arbitrator's finding (a) was a finding to the effect either (1) that the rise or fall in the rate of wages was not a relevant consideration; or (2) that he had not in fact taken this element into consideration. In either case he was wrong in law. If there was any doubt as to what the arbitrator's view really was, the case should be remitted to him for more explicit statement.

* The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), First Schedule (3), enacts:—"In fixing the amount of the weekly payment, regard shall be had to any payment, allowance, or benefit which the workman may receive from the employer during the period of his incapacity, and in the case of partial incapacity the weekly payment shall in no case exceed the difference between the amount of the average weekly earnings of the workman before the accident and the average weekly amount which he is earning or is able to earn in some suitable employment or business after the accident, but shall bear such relation to the amount of that difference as under the circumstances of the case may appear proper."

Malcolm v.
Thomas

Co., Limited.

Argued for the respondents;—This was an application by a minor workman suffering from total incapacity, and the paragraph which regulated such an application was the 16th, and not the 3rd, of the First Schedule. Under the 16th paragraph the arbitrator's only duty was to arrive at a finding upon the facts of what wage the workman would probably have been able to earn at the date of review had he remained uninjured. Upon that question the arbitrator had found that the workman would probably not in fact have been able to earn at that date more than 25s. per week. It must be inferred that the arbitrator had taken all relevant circumstances into account in deciding this question of fact, including the rate of wages at the time. The question really raised in the case was, Did this rise in the rate of wages per se entitle the workman to an increase of compensation? although it was not stated in these precise terms in the question of law. The answer to this question should clearly be in the negative. The arbitrator was concerned only with the workman's probable earning capacity,¹ and a rise or fall in the rate of wages did not per se determine this question.² The arbitrator was not concerned with the calculation of any difference between two rates of wages. The duty of calculating a difference only arose in dealing with an application under paragraph (3). That paragraph applied only to application for review by a workman of full age, and its directions with regard to calculating a difference applied only in a case of partial incapacity. Even if the arbitrator were concerned with the calculation of a difference, which he was not, the rate of wages on the basis of which the voluntary agreement proceeded was not to be taken as concluding against the respondents the appellant's wage-earning capacity at its date. The arbitrator had rightly decided that he was not bound, upon the evidence of the agreement plus the rise in the rate of wages, to increase the compensation, and the appeal should be dismissed.

At advising on 4th July 1913,—

LORD KINNEAR.—The question in this case depends upon the construction of paragraph (16) of the First Schedule to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906.

The facts are that the appellant, the workman, who was born on 13th January 1893, received injury by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment on 2nd September 1907, when he was still a boy, since which date he was totally incapacitated from work up to the date of the application to review. Therefore it is a case of the total incapacity of

² Jamieson v. Fife Coal Co., Limited, (1903) 5 F. 958; Black v. Merry & Cunninghame, Limited, 1909 S. C. 1150.

July 4, 1913. a minor arising from an injury in the course of and arising out of his employment. The appellant, whose average earnings before the accident were 13s. a week, was paid compensation at the rate of 10s. per week from the date of the accident to 19th January 1912, and then the rate was increased by agreement to 12s. 6d. per week, and the Sheriff says that that alteration was made because the parties were agreed that, if he had remained uninjured, the probable amount of his earnings at the date when the increase was made would have been 25s. a week.

Malcolm v.
Thomas
Spowart &
Co., Limited.
Lord Kinnear.

Now, so matters stood until the present application was presented on the 23rd September 1912. It is an application by the workman to have the compensation of 12s. 6d. increased to 17s. 6d. per week on the ground that, but for his accident, the appellant would have been able to have earned at least 35s. per week. Then the Sheriff-substitute goes on to say that the appellant averred in support of his application that he would have been fit to do any work in connection with the pit which a young man of his age and intelligence, and with the experience and skill which he would have possessed but for the accident, could have got. And then he gives some particulars as to the exact amount of wages that he might earn at certain employments. Now that was a perfectly relevant claim for the consideration of the Sheriff-substitute, because it is exactly within the rule of paragraph (16). That is the paragraph which allows weekly payments to be reviewed and ended, diminished, or increased, at the request either of the employer or of the workman. And to that general allowance it adds this proviso that, where the workman was, at the date of the accident, under twenty-one years of age and the review takes place more than twelve months after the accident, the amount of the weekly payment may be increased to any amount not exceeding 50 per cent of the weekly sum which the workman would probably have been earning at the date of review if he had remained uninjured.

Now the facts which the Sheriff-substitute says were alleged by the workman bring his case exactly within that provision. The workman says that, if he had remained uninjured, he would, at the date when he asked for review, have been able to earn a sum which he estimated at, at least, 35s. a week. That laid upon the Sheriff-substitute the duty of taking evidence and of determining, as a question of fact, whether the applicant's case was made out or not, and that was the course which he took. He says the case was heard before him and that he found certain facts. In the first place, that the appellant is in receipt of compensation from the respondents at the rate of 12s. 6d. per week. That is upon the agreement. Secondly, that that compensation is based on an earning power of 25s. per week as the weekly sum which the appellant would probably have been earning at the date of the agreement if he had remained uninjured. I pause simply to point out that that is not the sum which he was earning at the date of the accident but a considerably larger sum which both parties had agreed should be taken as the sum that he would probably have been earning at the date when the agreement was made. Thirdly, that it was not proved that the earning capacity of lads of nineteen years of age exceeds 25s. a week, and that there was nothing in the evidence which made the Sheriff-substitute think that the appellant would have earned more than other lads of his own age.

Fourthly, that the appellant had failed to prove that his earning capacity July 4, 1913. at the date of the application for review would probably have increased since 19th January 1912, that is since the date of the agreement, if he had remained uninjured. Now these are perfectly clear and distinct findings in fact. As a matter of fact, the Sheriff says the earning capacity of other lads of his age does not exceed 25s. a week. There is nothing in the evidence to show that he could have earned more than other lads of his age. He has failed to prove that his earning capacity would have increased at the date of review if he had remained uninjured. I think that is a plain question of fact that the Sheriff-substitute has had to determine, and he has decided it in the way I have read. Nothing could be clearer to my mind than that that was a question for the Sheriff-substitute, and that we have no grounds for reviewing or interfering with the Sheriff-substitute's finding.

He then goes on to say that a case was made before him which raises a question of law, and it was made in this Court. I confess it seems to me that the contention of the appellant upon the point which the learned Sheriff-substitute now goes on to consider is somewhat singular. But still, it was seriously maintained. It was maintained in argument that the Sheriff-substitute was bound to increase the claimant's compensation because there had been a general increase in miners' wages in the district of 9d. per shift between the date of the agreement and the date of the arbitration. That is to say, the appellant contends, not merely that the fact of the wage at the date of the arbitration being at a certain rate is to be taken into account, and the fact of that rate being higher than it had previously been, but that the Sheriff-substitute is bound, upon that consideration alone, to increase the amount of the claimant's compensation. I entirely agree with the Sheriff-substitute that that is an extravagant claim. What the Sheriff-substitute has to do is to ascertain what, as a matter of fact, so far as it is ascertainable, is the sum which the minor workman would probably have been earning at the particular date. That is what he has considered and determined. And it is not, so far as I can see, of the slightest consequence whether the sum which it is thus shown the man might have earned is greater or less than the weekly wages which he might have earned at some previous time.

I think that a great deal of confusion was introduced into the appellant's argument by dragging into the discussion a number of decisions upon a totally different question, and they are decisions which are quite irrelevant to the question which we have to determine, because the learned counsel cited to us all the cases—and there are several—in which the Court, in considering the comparison which is to be made under paragraph (3) between the average weekly earnings before the accident of a workman who, notwithstanding his injury, is still able to work, and the average weekly amount which he is able to earn after the accident, had occasion to consider what circumstances ought to be taken into account by the arbitrator in determining that question. But that is not the provision under which the arbitrator in this case was required to act at all, and he has nothing to do with the problem that paragraph (3) raises. That arises only in the case of partial incapacity. It is expressly so put, and the obvious meaning of it is that, in fixing the amount of the weekly payment to be made to the

His problem, therefore, is to compare these two amounts and take care that, in fixing the compensation, he does not exceed the difference between them. But under the 16th paragraph we have nothing to do with any such process at all. When the application is made by a workman suffering from total incapacity in consequence of the injury, you have nothing to do with that comparison, because the workman is earning nothing. The condition of the case is that he has been totally incapacitated for work, and the only reason of any difference being made between his case and that of other workmen is that which is very clearly brought out in the paragraph, that, because he was a boy at the time of the injury, and had not yet attained his full earning capacity, the arbitrator, in reviewing the compensation after the lapse of twelve months, may take into account what he might reasonably have been expected to earn if he had been allowed to grow up without injury; but in doing that there are no considerations put before the arbitrator by the statute except the single question: What is the amount of weekly wage the man would probably have earned if he had been uninjured?

Lord Kinnear.

The argument, apparently before the Sheriff-substitute, and before us, apart from the contentions which seem to me to be quite irrelevant upon the cases to which I have referred, was based upon this, that it was said that there was an agreement between the parties, on 19th January 1912, by which the compensation was fixed upon the footing that the workman would, at that date, have been earning 25s. per week. And then it is said that gives you a point to start from, and, if he shows now that the general wages in the district had risen to a certain amount since that date, the only process the arbitrator is required to go through is the arithmetical one of ascertaining the difference between the present rate of wages and the amount which the parties agreed the appellant should have more than a year ago. I entirely disagree with that proposition. I had some difficulty in following the ground in law upon which it was maintained, but I think it was put in two different ways. In the first place, it was put as if the appellant had, by virtue of this agreement, a legal right by contract to say that the standard for all future renewals of compensation was fixed once for all by agreement between the parties. If that is the argument, it is quite untenable. The agreement fixes nothing except that, until either party shall be dissatisfied and require it to be reviewed, a certain amount of compensation shall be paid by the one to the other. That is all that it fixes. If it fixed more, the appellant would still not be in a position to found upon anything fixed, because he is dissatisfied and throws it over. He is not content to abide by the agreement, and he says, "I am dissatisfied, and I want my compensation to be fixed not by agreement but by arbitration, so that I may get my legal compensation fixed." That is an intelligible proposition, but he must take his legal right apart altogether from the agreement.

But there was another view, a more plausible one although not a more sound one, which was this, that you are to take this agreement as conclusive evidence that, as a matter of fact, the appellant could have earned 25s. a week on 19th January 1912, and, that being accepted, then you prove that he is entitled to more now, because you prove that the general rate of wages has increased since then. I think that is as unsound a view as the other. The agreement proves nothing as to the fact of what he could have earned in January 1912. We do not know why the employer agreed to give him that amount. All we know is that the two parties settled that amount between them, and it stood as long as they were both satisfied with it. But upon what specific grounds it was given we do not know. I quite agree that, in certain circumstances, it might be an item of evidence tending to show what the alleged earning capacity was—that his own employer had agreed to give him a certain amount. That may or may not be, according to circumstances; but if it is an item of evidence, then it is just one of the points which the arbitrator has to consider, and it certainly is not a final and conclusive fact which compels him to increase the compensation in the way in which it is argued he should have done. The question remains for his decision.

That the arbitrator has considered this question is plain enough, because he tells us it was before him. Then he tells us that there was other evidence before him. He tells us, as a matter of fact, that the general rate of wages in the district has increased; but he also finds that boys in the same position and of the same age as this appellant were not earning more than 25s. a week, and that there was nothing to show that this appellant would have earned more than they did. It is plain enough that a rise in the general rate does not necessarily involve an increase in the amount earned by a particular workman or boy. Therefore, he treats the case as a question of fact, and upon precisely the right grounds, when he considers what is the evidence as to what the man would in fact have been earning if, at the date of the review, he had been uninjured.

The only difficulty I have had in considering the case arises from the reasoning of the learned Sheriff-substitute in the paragraph which is marked (a). I am not satisfied that I have quite followed the line of the reasoning which is there explained, because, in the course of that paragraph, the learned Sheriff-substitute makes an observation, the exact bearing of which I confess I do not understand, but which might be interpreted in a way to which I should certainly not assent, for he says that the rise or fall in the rate of wages, being dependent on the conditions of the labour market, is to be regarded in exactly the same way in the case of a minor workman as in the case of one of full age. If that means that, when it is proved that a workman at the date of review would have been earning more than he earned at the date of the accident, and that in the meantime the rate of wages had risen, therefore the amount that he would have so actually earned, according to that rate, is not to be taken into account in terms of the section, I should dissent altogether from that view. I think the learned Sheriff-substitute had nothing whatever to do with whether the actual rate was higher or lower than the actual rate at some other and previous time. The statute means that you are to find out what the wages would have been at the particular time. That must mean the wages at the rate then current,

July 4, 1913. and the rate then current must always be affected, one way or the other, by the state of the labour market.

Lord Kinnear.

I confess, however, that I think the remark to which I have referred is a remark in passing which did not determine the learned Sheriff-substitute's judgment. If it had, I should not have been able to follow it, because, in that part of the case, he is treating only of the argument as founded upon the fact of the agreement, and he says, I think quite rightly, that that is not a sound argument. But then he goes on to decide the case irrespective of the agreement altogether, and in that I think he was right, and his true ground of judgment is this, that it is not proved that the claimant's earning capacity would probably, but for the accident, have exceeded 25s. per week.

Well, then, the question in law he puts to us is this: Was I right in refusing to consider the general increase of 9d. a day in the miners' wages between the date of the agreement (19th January 1912) and the date of the application to review, as entitling the claimant to increase in compensation? If that meant, Was I to take into account the fact of the general rise at all? I should have very little hesitation in saying that it was a fact that he might take into account. But the true meaning of that question seems to me to be, Was I right in refusing to give effect to the applicant's argument that the rise in the general rate of wages in itself entitled him absolutely to an increase—not merely to have his case considered, but to an absolute increase in compensation? Now, I think that the Sheriff was quite right in saying that it did not, and therefore that we may answer the question in the affirmative.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I think that the question of law stated for the opinion of the Court cannot be answered without knowing something of its origin and its bearing; for I think it possible that I may agree in the abstract with the Sheriff in the answer which he has himself given to his question, and yet differ from him in the conclusions which have led him to state the question, and also differ from him in the effect which he would give to the answer.

The injured workman was at the date of the accident, viz., 2nd September 1907, and still is, a minor, and his case therefore falls to be exceptionally treated as provided for in the statute. He was earning 13s. a week, and accordingly under proviso (b) of paragraph (1) of the First Schedule he received at first 10s. a week of compensation. On 19th January 1912 the rate of compensation was increased to 12s. 6d. a week by agreement, on the assumption that if he had remained uninjured he would probably have been earning 25s. a week. On 23rd September 1912 he presented the present application to have his compensation reviewed and raised to 17s. 6d. a week, on the ground that, but for his accident, he would have been able to earn 35s. a week. He was at that date only nineteen years of age. It is a further fact in the case that between the agreement of 19th January 1912 for 12s. 6d. a week and the date of the proof in the present application there had been a general increase in miners' wages in the district of 9d. per shift, and the real question in dispute I understand to be, how does this fact affect the Sheriff's disposal of the matter of review?

In arbitrations under the statute and its schedules, in the general case the workman's average weekly earnings preceding the accident form a fixed July 4, 1913. datum in the estimation of his compensation. The first maximum figure under the First Schedule (1) (b) is fifty per cent of this weekly average, the second maximum under the same sub-paragraph is £1, and the third maximum is, under paragraph (3) of the same Schedule, the difference between the amount of this weekly average and the average weekly amount which the workman is earning or is able to earn after the accident. The lowest of these three is therefore the extreme compensation which the workman can recover. There is in the last-mentioned paragraph a clause limiting even this maximum in the case of partial disablement, but it has no bearing upon the present question. So stands it with the claimant when he is an adult, and it follows that the Sheriff as arbitrator is not concerned with the fact that wages may have risen or fallen since the date of the accident, except so far as this may affect the wages which the injured man is earning or is able to earn at the date of the Sheriff's consideration of the question of compensation.

Malcolm v.
Thomas
Spowart &
Co., Limited.
Ld. Johnston.

But to this rule of the Schedule the case of the minor workman forms an exception. He is, under paragraph (1) (b) of the First Schedule, to get 100 per cent of his previous average weekly earnings if these are under 20s., but not exceeding the weekly payment of 10s. But then when it comes to reviewing this payment under paragraph (16) it is specially provided that where the review takes place more than twelve months after the accident, the amount of the weekly payment may be increased to any amount not exceeding 50 per cent of the weekly sum which the workman would probably have been earning at the date of the review if he had remained uninjured, but not exceeding £1. Consequently the actual wages prior to the accident of the injured man form in this case no element in the consideration. The maxima in this case are only two in number, viz., £1, and the potential earnings of the injured man, had he remained uninjured, at the date of review. Hence it appears to me that the Sheriff must consider the state of the wage market, whether affected by rise or fall, at the date of the arbitration, and that the Sheriff's first reason (a) for refusing to give effect to the contention that wages had risen 9d. a shift between the date of the agreement of January 1912 and the date of the arbitration was ill-founded. But then his second reason (b) for the refusal is that, apart from the agreement of January 1912, it was not proved that the claimant's earning capacity would probably, but for the accident, have at the date of the arbitration exceeded the 25s. assumed as the basis of the agreement. This I understand to mean that even if there had been, as the Sheriff holds proved, a rise of 9d. after 19th January 1912, still the workman was as well or better off with the agreed-on 12s. 6d. a week than he would have been had the Sheriff been called upon to fix his compensation de novo at the date of the arbitration. In these circumstances it is not a little difficult to understand the true bearing of the question stated, which is: "Was I right in refusing to consider the general increase of 9d. a day in the miners' wages between the date of the agreement (19th January 1912) and the date of the application to review as entitling the claimant to an increase in compensation?" If this means, was the Sheriff right in refusing to consider the rise of wages in determining the potential wage-earning capacity

July 4, 1913. of the injured man at the date of the proof, then I should answer the query in the negative. But if it means, was the Sheriff right in refusing to consider the rise of wages, since the last fixing of the compensation, as per se a reason for increasing the compensation without regard to the potential earning capacity of the claimant, then I should answer the query in the affirmative.

Malcolm v. Thomas Spowart & Co., Limited.
Ld. Johnston.

Though the Sheriff might have stated more clearly the point which he intended to present to the Court, I think that the second alternative view of the meaning of the question is the correct one, and that the Sheriff came to a right conclusion in holding that he was not entitled or bound to take the agreed-on figure of 19th January 1912 as a fixed starting point, and automatically to add 50 per cent of the rise of wages as from the date of the present application. I think that he was right in considering the earning capacity of lads of the same age in the same employment at the date of the inquiry, and if, as he says, he was satisfied that that did not exceed 25s., even allowing for a market rise in wages, that it followed that there was no call for an increase in the compensation at the date of the application to him.

I would therefore propose to your Lordships that the question should not be answered as it stands, because I think the result of the question, so answered, would be misleading; but that it should be answered to this effect, that the Sheriff was right in refusing to consider the general increase of 9d. a day in miners' wages between the two dates specified as per se entitling the claimant to an increase in compensation.

LORD MACKENZIE.—This is an appeal from an award of the Sheriff-substitute refusing, on an application for review, to increase the workman's compensation in respect of total incapacity.

The workman was under twenty-one at the date of the accident; the review took place more than twelve months after the accident. The provisions of the First Schedule (16) of the Act of 1906, therefore applied to the case, under which "the amount of the weekly payment may be increased to any amount not exceeding 50 per cent of the weekly sum which the workman would probably have been earning at the date of the review if he had remained uninjured, but not in any case exceeding one pound." What the Sheriff-substitute had to do was to ascertain what was the weekly sum that the workman would probably have been earning. No comparison is needed, as would be the case under (3), where during partial incapacity the weekly payment is not to exceed the difference between the average weekly earnings before and after the accident.

The Sheriff-substitute has made a finding directly applicable to (16). He finds:—" (3) That it was not proved that the earning capacity of lads of nineteen years of age exceeds 25s. per week, and that there was nothing in the evidence which made me think that the appellant would have earned more than other lads of his own age." That would appear to end the case, but the appellant contends that the Sheriff-substitute was bound to have proceeded thus:—First, to take the rate of compensation fixed by agreement, on 19th January 1912, at 12s. 6d. (50 per cent of 25s.), as fixing a standard; then to make an addition to that in consequence of a general increase of 9d. a day in miners' wages between the date of the agreement July 4, 1913. and the application for review on 23rd September 1912, and by a purely mathematical process bring out an increase as due to the appellant. Accordingly he asked the Sheriff to state a case in which this is the question of law put :—" Was I right in refusing to consider the general increase of 9d. a day in the miners' wages between the date of the agreement (19th January 1912) and the date of the application to review, as entitling the claimant to increase in compensation?" The question is not so clearly put as it might be, but I read it as meaning, whether the increase of 9d. a day in the wages per se entitled the appellant to an increase in compensation. This is the reading consistent with the appellant's argument, which was that the Sheriff-substitute was bound to increase the compensation because there had been a general increase in wages.

Malcolm v. Thomas Spowart & Co., Limited.
Lord Mac-kenzie.

I can find no warrant in the statute for the appellant's contention. Nor can I see that any question of general principle is raised by this case. The point is not whether the Sheriff-substitute was entitled to shut his eyes to the fact that at the date of review wages had gone up by 9d. It is not to be supposed that he would do so, and it must be taken that in fixing under (16) what the workman would probably have been earning as at 23rd September 1912 he took the rate of wages then being paid. The observations that the Sheriff-substitute makes in paragraph (a) bear solely on his view as to what is sufficient to constitute a change of circumstances. If the Sheriff-substitute had dismissed the application for review on the ground that there had been no change of circumstances it might have been necessary to consider the question so raised. But he did not. He disposed of the application on its merits, and refused it. There appears to me no ground for holding that the Sheriff-substitute went wrong in law, and in my opinion the question should be answered in the affirmative.

LORD KINNEAR.—I quite assent to Lord Johnston's suggestion that we should find in the terms which he has proposed, introducing the words "per se" into the finding although they are not in the question. That is exactly in accordance with the view expressed by myself and by Lord Mac-kenzie as our understanding of the question, but it will certainly be more convenient and desirable that it should be clearly expressed.

I cannot see any reason why the expenses should not follow the appeal in the ordinary way.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor :—" Find in answer to the question of law in the case that the Sheriff-substitute as arbitrator was right in refusing to consider the general increase of 9d. a day in the miners' wages between the date of the agreement (19th January 1912) and the date of the application to review as per se entitling the claimant to increase in compensation : Dismiss the appeal, and decern."

Expenses—Taxation—Sheriff Court expenses awarded on appeal in Court of Session—Scale of taxation—Time for determination of scale—C. A. S., 1913, M. ii.

The C. A. S., 1913, M. ii., provides that, in actions for damages in the Sheriff Court, expenses shall be taxed on a higher or a lower scale according to whether or not the sum decerned for exceeds £50, unless the Sheriff shall direct otherwise.

In an action of damages in the Sheriff Court the pursuer was awarded £100, but on appeal to the Court of Session that sum was reduced to £50 with expenses. The Auditor of the Court of Session having taxed the Sheriff Court expenses on the lower scale, the pursuer lodged a note of objections.

Held that the Auditor had rightly taxed the expenses on the lower scale, and observed that, if the pursuer desired taxation on the higher scale, he should have moved for an instruction to the Auditor to that effect at the time when he obtained his award of expenses, it being too late to raise the question by way of objection to the Auditor's report.

2D DIVISION. (SEQUEL to previous report, supra, p. 896.)

Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

On 1st June 1911 Robert Mickel brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against Mrs Sarah M'Coard, concluding for payment of £350 in respect of damage to a house belonging to the pursuer of which the defender was the tenant.

On 15th February 1912, after a proof, the Sheriff-substitute (Craigie) decerned against the defender for payment of £100 as damages and found her liable in expenses.

On 19th March 1912 the defender appealed to the Court of Session, and on 26th March 1912 the defender lodged a minute by which she tendered £50 with expenses in full of the conclusions of the action.

The tender was not accepted, and the case was heard before the Second Division who, on 16th May 1913, recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, decerned against the defender for payment of £50 as damages, found the defender liable to the pursuer in expenses down to the date of the minute of tender, but subject to modification, found the pursuer liable to the defender in expenses subsequent to the date of the tender, allowed accounts thereof to be lodged, and remitted the same to the Auditor to tax and report.*

At the advising no motion was made to the Court with regard to the scale upon which the pursuer's account of expenses in the Sheriff Court should be taxed.†

* Reported supra, p. 896.

† The Codifying Act of Sederunt, 1913, M. ii., enacts:—

Sec. 1. "In the Ordinary Sheriff Court, except as after stated, there shall be two scales of taxation, viz., first, for causes where the amount of principal concluded for does not exceed £50; and second, for causes exceeding that amount. In all cases the Sheriff may appoint that expenses shall be subject to modification."

Sec. 2. "(1) The scale for taxation shall in the ordinary case be deter-

The pursuer lodged an account of his expenses down to the date July 11, 1913. of the tender, amounting in the Sheriff Court as stated on the higher scale to £197, 17s. 1d. and in the Court of Session to £15, 18s. 6d. Mickel v.
M'Coard.

The Auditor taxed the expenses in the Sheriff Court on the lower scale at £124, 8s. 2d., and in the Court of Session at the sum claimed, viz., £15, 18s. 6d.

The pursuer lodged a note of objections to the Auditor's report, "in so far as the Auditor has taxed the pursuer's account in the Sheriff Court on the lower scale."

Counsel were heard on the Auditor's report and the note of objections on 11th July 1913 in the Single Bills of the Second Division.

Argued for the pursuer;—(1) Under the C. A. S., 1913, M. ii. (which embodied the Act of Sederunt, 10th April 1908), the power of determining the scale upon which expenses in the Sheriff Court should be taxed was conferred on the Sheriff alone. The case of Thomson v. Glasgow Taxi-Cab Company, Limited,¹ was not an authority against this view, because there the pursuer's acceptance of a tender of £25 made it clear that expenses on the higher scale could never have been given in the Sheriff Court. In the case of Reid v. North Isles District Committee of County Council of Orkney,² the Court had remitted to the Sheriff to exercise his discretion in analogous circumstances. In the present case the pursuer's expenses should have been taxed on the higher scale originally allowed by the Sheriff, or at least the case should be remitted to the Sheriff in order that he might fix the scale in view of the judgment of the Court upon the appeal. (2) In the circumstances only a slight modification of the pursuer's expenses should be allowed.

Argued for the defender;—(1) The Auditor had acted rightly. Having no instructions to the contrary, he had acted in conformity with the Act of Sederunt which provided that the scale for taxation should be regulated by the amount decerned for.³ The Court of Session had an absolute discretion as to expenses in all cases, but if a litigant desired special treatment he should ask for it at the proper time. If the pursuer had wanted to have his expenses taxed on the higher scale, he should have made a motion to that effect when the judgment was pronounced. (2) In the circumstances the defender was entitled to a substantial modification of the pursuer's account of expenses.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—A question has been raised regarding the scale upon which the pursuer's expenses in the Sheriff Court should be taxed. It is too late now to raise this question. According to the Act of Sederunt the scale of taxation in an action of damages is determined by the sum decerned for, and as our decerniture was for a sum of £50, the Auditor has acted rightly in taxing the pursuer's expenses upon the lower scale. If the mined by the principal sum concluded for, but in all cases it shall be competent to the Sheriff to direct that the expenses shall be taxed according to the scale applicable to the amount decerned for. . . . (3) In actions of damages, the scale for taxation of the account between party and party shall for the pursuer's Agent be regulated by the sum decerned for, unless the Sheriff shall otherwise direct."

³ C. A. S., 1913, M. ii. 2 (3).

July 11, 1913. pursuer desired a different scale to be applied, he should have made the appropriate motion before the account was remitted to the Auditor.
 Mickel v. M'Coard.

As to the amount of modification, this is a matter which can only be determined in a general way. My view is that the expenses of the pursuer in the Sheriff Court should be modified to £100.

LORD DUNDAS.—I agree.

LORD SALVESEN.—The only point of general interest is what is to happen when an award by the Sheriff for a sum which implies taxation on the higher scale has been reduced by this Court to one for a sum to which the lower scale is in ordinary circumstances appropriate. I am clear that we have power to deal with the scale of taxation. I am also clear that if any question is to be raised on that point, it should be raised at the time when judgment is pronounced, for the Auditor should receive his instructions at the time when the account is remitted to him. There need be no difficulty if counsel have the provisions of the Act of Sederunt in view when the case is disposed of, and move the Court then to tax the accounts upon the scale which they think appropriate. It is too late to come back to the Court after the Auditor has dealt with the matter. The question comes up upon a note of objections, but these objections are untenable seeing that the Auditor has already taxed the account upon the only scale which it was competent for him to apply.

As regards modification, I think that substantial justice will be done if the pursuer's account is modified to the extent indicated by your Lordship.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I concur with your Lordship in the chair.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—" . . . Approve of the Auditor's report on the pursuer's account . . . and decern and ordain the defender to make payment of the sum of £115, 18s. 6d., the amount contained in said account as taxed and modified."

Adamson v. George Anderson & Co. (1905), Limited.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), sec. 1 (1)—Accident arising out of and in the course of the employment—Injury by falling slate during a gale.

During a severe gale an engineer's fitter was engaged in erecting machinery in an open yard near to a building from the roof of which slates were being blown. While stooping to adjust a large piece of machinery he was struck on the head by a falling slate and injured.

Held that the arbitrator was entitled to find that the accident arose out of the employment.

IN an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, July 12, 1913. between William Adamson and his employers, George Anderson & Company (1905), Limited, the Sheriff-substitute at Dundee (Neish) awarded compensation, and at the request of the employers stated a case for appeal.

Adamson v.
George
Anderson &
Co. (1905),
Limited.

The case set forth :—

" By joint minute of admissions the following facts (reserving all questions of relevancy and competency) were admitted :—

1st DIVISION.
Sheriff of Forfarshire.

" 1. On 26th November 1912 the pursuer in the course of his employment with defenders as a foreman fitter was engaged in erecting a stone-planing machine in the yard of Messrs John Emery & Sons, masons, builders, and contractors, Polmadie, Glasgow, to which they were then in course of removing from their former yard in another part of the city. The new yard in question is on the north-east side of the eastern division of Jessie Street, Polmadie, Glasgow. Messrs Emery purchased from defenders a new stone-planing machine, defenders undertaking in their contract to erect same in the new yard, and also the old machines brought from the former yard, which they did. Pursuer, as foreman fitter for defenders, was in charge of and did this work.

" 2. On the west of Messrs Emery & Sons' yard and next to it is the yard of Messrs Montgomery & Strachan, saw millers, the entrance to which is on the same side of Jessie Street as the entrance to the yard of Messrs Emery. In the yard of Messrs Montgomery & Strachan is a building used as a wood-store, running back from and at right angles to Jessie Street and parallel with Messrs Emery's yard. This wood-store is a building about 76 feet in length and is approximately 21 feet 10 inches in height to the wall head from the ground level, and approximately 31 feet 6 inches in height to the ridge of the roof from the ground level. Between said wood-store and the western boundary of Messrs Emery & Sons' yard is a yard or open space about 50 feet in width, on the west of the yard being said wood-store, and on the east a wooden paling or fence about 6 feet in height, which divides it from the said yard of Messrs Emery & Sons.

" 3. On said 26th November 1912 a very violent gale from the south-west was raging. As a result of the gale, slates, chimney-cans, iron roofing, bricks, stones, and other parts of buildings were blown from the roofs of a number of houses and other buildings in Glasgow, and several passengers in the streets, a few persons inside buildings, and others, received injuries. In particular, during the more violent gusts of wind, a considerable number of slates were blown off the roof of said wood-store, some of them into Messrs Montgomery & Strachan's yard and others into the yard of Messrs Emery & Sons.

" 4. During the gale, and between eleven and twelve o'clock on 26th November aforesaid, pursuer was engaged in the open air stooping over and placing in position a large spur wheel, and tightening a nut, forming part of said stone-planing machine which he was erecting in Messrs Emery's said yard as aforesaid. There were a number of men in the employment of Messrs Emery & Sons and others also working in the open air in said yard. Said spur wheel had just been lowered into position by means of a hand-crane belonging to Messrs Emery & Sons. Said machine was being erected at a point in Messrs Emery's said yard about 127 feet 6 inches from the north-east corner, and about 172 feet from the south-east corner of said wood-store belonging to Messrs Montgomery & Strachan. While so engaged pursuer was struck and injured on the head by one of said slates blown from off the roof of said wood-store. Owing to the pursuer's stooping position at his work at the time he did not see the slate coming, and was thereby prevented from dodging it, as that and other slates were dodged by other workmen there at the time. Owing to the then incomplete state of Messrs Emery's yard—due to the fact that the fitting-up of same was not yet finished—the place where said machine was being erected was not enclosed and roofed in, as it now is and was then intended to be (after erection of this and other machines), by a wooden shed which would, had it been there then, have protected the pursuer from the injuries he received as aforesaid. The shed was not put up by defenders, and was not meant to be erected before completion of pursuer's work. It contains and protects said stone-planing machine and other machines used by Messrs Emery in said yard." The parties further admitted that the pursuer, as a result of his injuries, was at present totally incapacitated for work, and renounced probation.

The Sheriff-substitute's finding was as follows:—"I found in fact in terms of the minute of admissions (Nos. 4 and 6 of process). I found in fact and in law that the respondent was injured by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, and awarded the respondent compensation at the rate of £1 sterling per week from 26th November 1912 until the further orders of the Court."

The question of law for the opinion of the Court was:—"Whether there was evidence upon which it could competently be found that the personal injury sustained by the pursuer and respondent was the result of an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906?"

The case was heard before the First Division (without Lord Mackenzie) on 21st June 1913.

Argued for the appellants;—The accident did not arise out of the pursuer's employment. The risk to which he was exposed was not peculiar to the place of his employment or to the posture he had assumed. It was a risk common to all who were out of doors in every part of Glasgow on the day of the accident.¹

Argued for the respondent;—The nature of the pursuer's employment, which kept him working in an exposed yard, and the stooping posture he was forced to assume at his work, which prevented him from keeping a lookout for falling slates, exposed him to a risk that was not common to all who were out of doors on that day. It was an extra risk incidental to his employment, and justified the finding that the accident had arisen out of that employment.²

LORD JOHNSTON.—This case is lucidly stated by the learned Sheriff-substitute by reference to a comprehensive minute of admissions.

Adamson v.
George
Anderson &
Co. (1905),
Limited.

The material facts are that a foreman fitter was engaged on 26th November 1912, in the employment of an engineering firm, in fitting up heavy stone-planing machinery in a builders' yard which at the time was not covered in. An exceptionally severe storm occurred on that day, sufficiently severe to justify the admission that, "As a result of the gale, slates, chimney-cans, iron roofing, bricks, stones, and other parts of buildings were blown from the roofs of a number of houses and other buildings in Glasgow, and several passengers in the streets, a few persons inside buildings, and others, received injuries; in particular, during the more violent gusts of wind, a considerable number of slates were blown off the roof of" an adjoining wood-store, some of them into the yard in which Adamson was working. While engaged in his work Adamson was struck and injured on the head by one of the slates blown off the roof of the above-mentioned wood-store. At the moment Adamson "was engaged in the open air stooping over and placing in position a large spur wheel, and tightening a nut, forming part of said stone-planing machine which he was erecting."

The Sheriff-substitute has found that Adamson was injured by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. I am of opinion that there is nothing to justify this Court in disturbing the Sheriff-substitute's judgment. We are not concerned with whether the accident arose in the course of the employment; the question is, did it arise out of the employment? No doubt the question whether an accident arises out of a man's employment is often a very difficult one, and this case is very near the border line; on which side it is to fall is, I think, a question of mixed law and fact. But I cannot find that the Sheriff's conclusion is affected by any wrong view of the law. Its soundness depends, I think, entirely upon whether the facts have been rightly estimated with reference to the law.

This case is one of the class where a workman is injured by accident arising from a cause or state of circumstances to which all persons are more or less exposed, such as street traffic, severe weather, &c. In these cases the risk is a common or normal risk, and the question broadly put is whether the workman's exposure to it was abnormal or excessive by reason of his employment. If it is the normal risk merely which causes the accident, the answer must be that the accident did not arise out of the employment. But if the position which the workman must necessarily occupy in connection with his work results in excessive exposure to the common risk,¹ or if the continuity or exceptional amount of exposure aggravates the common risk,² then it is open to conclude that the accident did not arise out of the common risk but out of the employment.

It was said by the County Court Judge in Andrew's case³: "In this case, therefore, if I come to the conclusion that, as a matter of fact, the July 12, 1913. position in which the man was working was dangerous, and that, in consequence of the dangerous position, the accident occurred, I could fairly hold that the accident arose out of the employment. Now was it a dangerous position? Was the man exposed to something more than the normal risk, which everybody, so to speak, incurs at any time and in any place during a thunderstorm? We know that lightning is erratic, and possibly no position or circumstances can afford absolute safety. But, if there is under particular circumstances in a particular vocation something appreciably and substantially beyond the ordinary normal risk which ordinary people run, and which is a necessary concomitant of the occupation the man is engaged in, then I am entitled to say that the extra danger to which the man is exposed is something arising out of his employment; and if, in consequence of that extra danger, a fatality occurs, I am entitled to say that the section applies, and the applicant is entitled to recover"; and in quoting with approval this statement, Collins, M.R., added: "I should be unable, I think, to frame a more accurate direction than this, if I had to direct a jury in such a case."

Ld. Johnston.

I think that on such a direction the learned Sheriff-substitute here was entitled to find for the workman in respect that, though the results of a storm of such intensity as occurred on 26th November 1912 are a general risk, the fact that he was engaged in the open air bending over to adjust heavy machinery is a fact from which it may reasonably be deduced that under the circumstances of his particular vocation he was exposed to something apparently beyond the normal risk, and that to this abnormal exposure the accident was attributable. If so, we cannot disturb his verdict.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am of the same opinion. I think the case is a narrow one, but, after all, the point that we have to decide is whether there was evidence on which the learned Sheriff-substitute as arbitrator was entitled to come to the conclusion at which he arrived. I think there was.

Upon the general law on the matter, I do not think I need say any more, because I really said all I had to say in Blakey v. Robson, Eckford, & Company.¹

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT answered the question of law in the affirmative, and dismissed the appeal.

Danmark v.
Poulsen & Co.

Ship—Charter-party—Demurrage—Exceptions—Strikes—Loading delayed by strike—Liability of charterers—Failure of charterers to take reasonable measures to ensure timeous delivery of cargo.

A charter-party for the carriage of a cargo of coal, which stipulated for the completion of the loading within a certain period, contained a clause exempting the charterers from liability for time lost through "strikes," or any unavoidable accidents beyond their control, "preventing or delaying the working, loading, or shipping of the said cargo."

In an action for demurrage against the charterers they pleaded this clause of exception, averring that the delay had been caused by a strike. It was proved (1) that a strike of coal-trimmers had caused the colliery company, with whom the charterers had contracted for delivery of the coals, to restrict their output, and they did not deliver the coals in time for the loading which, but for the strike, they would probably have done; but (2) that the contract between the charterers and the colliery company contained no clause binding the company to deliver the coals in time for the loading; and (3) that it would not have been impossible for them to deliver the coals in time had they been bound to do so.

Held that the defenders were liable in demurrage, in respect that—even if the strike were the direct cause of the delay, which was not proved—the failure of the charterers to contract for the timeous delivery of the coal was a failure to take reasonable measures to prevent avoidable delay, which excluded them from the benefit of the exception in the charter-party.

ON 26th September 1911 Dampskibsselskabet Danmark, Copenhagen, Denmark, registered owners of the steamship "Helge," and Beveridge, Sutherland, & Smith, W.S., Leith, their mandataries, brought an action against Christian Poulsen & Company, coal exporters, Glasgow, concluding for payment of £142, 10s. as demurrage due to them by the defenders for a period during which the "Helge" had been detained in loading a cargo beyond the time stipulated in a charter-party entered into between the parties.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Cullen.

The charter-party, which was dated 5th July 1911, stipulated that the "Helge" should proceed to Leith, whence, after loading a full cargo of coals of about 2550 tons, she was to proceed to Cronstadt. The cargo was to be loaded in eighty-four running hours, commencing "not before 6 A.M. on the 15th/17th July," and counting from the date when notice was given to the charterers' agents.

The charter-party further provided:—

"6. If the steamer be detained beyond her loading time, the charterers to pay demurrage at the rate of 16/8 per running hour.

"The parties hereto mutually exempt each other from all liability (except under the strike rules) arising from or for time lost through riots, strikes, lockouts of workmen, or disputes between masters and men, or by reason of accidents to mines or machinery, obstructions on railways or in harbours (not including congestion of ships or traffic), or by reason of frosts, floods, fogs, storms and any unavoidable accidents and hindrances beyond their control, either preventing July 10, 1913. or delaying the working, leading, or shipping of the said cargo, occurring on or after the date of this charter until the expiration of the loading time; and thereafter if the steamer be not available.”

Dampskibsselskabet
Danmark v.
Poulsen & Co.

The pursuers averred that the “Helge” arrived at Leith on 16th July 1911. Notice of readiness to load was duly given on the following morning, and the running hours commenced at 9 A.M. on that day, and expired at 9 A.M. on 20th July. The loading was not completed till 3 A.M. on 28th July, and as a result the vessel was detained for 174 hours, in respect of which the demurrage due under the charter-party amounted to £142, 10s.

In reply to the pursuers’ claim, the amount of which was not in dispute, the defenders founded on the exception clause in the charter-party above quoted, and averred that they “contracted with colliery companies to supply the cargo of coal required to be provided by the said charter-party, and that, but for the occurrence of strikes and also stoppages of the collieries and unavoidable hindrances beyond the defenders’ control which delayed the working, leading, and shipping of the cargo, the same would have been loaded without any demurrage being incurred. In particular, a strike of dock coal-trimmers started on 5th and continued till 12th July 1911. This caused delay in the loading up of vessels booked to the said collieries, and resulted in stoppages at the pits from which coal for fulfilling the charter was being obtained on 7th, 8th, 10th, 11th, and 12th July, which in turn prevented the colliery from producing and forwarding in time the coal bought by the defenders, as otherwise would have been the case. In the result, the defenders were unable to get the cargo forward, through no fault of their own.”

In answer to this defence the pursuers averred that the cause of the delay was not the strike, but the failure of the defenders to contract with the colliery companies for the timeous delivery of the coal.

The facts relating to this defence are fully stated in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary.

The pursuers pleaded;—The defenders having failed to load said steamship “Helge” within the running hours specified in the charter-party and demurrage having been thereby incurred to the amount of the sum sued for, the pursuers are entitled to decree as concluded for.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(4) The delay complained of having been due to causes in respect of which the defenders are exempted from liability under the terms of the charter-party, they should be assolizied.

On 26th July 1912 the Lord Ordinary (Cullen), after a proof, decerned against the defenders for payment to the pursuers of the sum sued for.*

* “OPINION.—[After narrating the terms of the charter-party]—The facts which are founded on by the defenders as bringing in the exception clause are as follows:—Between 5th July and 12th July there was a strike of dock coal-trimmers and scutchers at Leith. This prevented the loading of coal during that period. In consequence, collieries sending coal for shipment to Leith Docks had to restrict their output, as the coal already forward was not being shipped, and there was thus no outlet. In particular, the Edinburgh Collieries Company, Limited, with whom the defenders had placed an order for 1500 tons of Lothians steam coal for the ‘Helge’ was affected in this way. After the strike ended on 12th July there were arrears of shipment, and more ships wanting coal than could be at once

The defenders reclaimed, and the case was heard before the Second July 10, 1913. Division (without Lord Salvesen) on 12th and 13th June 1913.

Argued for the reclaimers;—The cause of the delay was the strike, or—which was the same thing¹—the congestion following on the termination of the strike; and accordingly the defenders were protected by the exemption clause in the charter-party. With regard to the contract between the defenders and the Edinburgh Collieries Company, the Lord Ordinary had taken a wrong view of the facts. On a sound construction of the contract, the colliery company were bound to deliver the coal for loading on 15th/17th July. But even if this were not so, the defenders' position was unaffected. Their duty was to act reasonably,² but they were not bound to take extraordinary measures to prevent delay.³ They had made a contract which under ordinary circumstances would have ensured timeous delivery of the coal. They were not bound to foresee a strike and to make provisions for neutralising its effect.

Dampskibsselskabet
Danmark v.
Poulsen & Co.

supplied with it. Delays in loading thus took place, and, in particular, the 'Helge' was delayed in her loading to the extent of the time already stated.

"The answer made by the pursuers is that the defenders did not take due steps to provide a cargo for the 'Helge,' and that the delay in loading was due to this cause and not to the effects of the strike. They allow that had the strike not occurred there is every probability that the 'Helge' would have been loaded timeously. But they say that the defenders failed duly to arrange for the punctual supply of 1700 tons of the 2500 tons loaded, and that the evidence does not prove that if they had made due arrangements for such supply the strike would have had the effect of preventing the steamer from being loaded within the running hours.

"The defenders start with an absolute obligation to provide a cargo, so far as not qualified by exceptions in the charter-party; and the onus is on them to prove that the facts of the case bring them within the exception clause already quoted. This clause is not limited to strikes preventing or delaying only the shipping, but extends to the effect of strikes in preventing or delaying 'the working, leading, or shipping' of the cargo. It thus seems to contemplate the ship being booked for one or more particular collieries, and to intend to provide for the effects of a strike on these collieries.

"I shall now advert to the facts relating to the providing of the cargo by the defenders. They placed an order with the Ormiston Colliery for 800 to 1000 tons. The colliery obliged themselves only for 800 tons, and the remaining 200 tons were in their option. They exercised the option by supplying only 800 tons, which were loaded within the running hours. The reason why they did not supply 1000 tons was the restriction of their output consequent on the said strike. But as the defenders had made no firm bargain for 1000 tons they were, so far, left without any actual provision for 200 tons of the cargo. And they did not find this 200 tons until 26th July, and it was not shipped until 27th July.

"For the remaining 1500 tons the defenders placed an order with the Edinburgh Collieries Company, Limited. The colliery company's sale-note is No. 14 of process. It is dated 5th July, and bears that the coal is 'to be shipped this month, as may be mutually arranged. We do not undertake any liability for loading time unless under written guarantee.' The contract

Argued for the respondents;—The authorities cited by the claimers had no application, for they were all cases where a cargo had been supplied, and where the only question was as to delay in loading or discharging. The obligation of the charterers to supply cargo was absolute,¹ and they could derive no protection from the "strikes" clause in the charter-party even if they had been able to prove—which they had failed to do—that, whatever contract had been made with the colliery company, the strike would still have delayed delivery of the coal. The strike and consequent restricted output of coal were not causes of delay in the sense of the exemption clause.² Further, on the evidence—of which the Lord Ordinary had taken the correct view—it appeared that the true cause of the delay was not the strike, but the failure of the defenders to make a binding contract with the colliery company for the timeous delivery of the coal. Such a contract would in all probability have prevented delay, thus gave the company until 31st July to supply the coal, apart from mutual arrangement. The company have all along maintained this construction of the contract, and Mr Bonnington, their representative, who gave evidence for the defenders, reiterated it. It may not be of moment what the company maintain as matter of construction, but their construction appears to me to be right.

"The way in which the terms of this contract, so construed, bear on the question at issue is this. After the strike terminated the Edinburgh Collieries Company, Limited, had enough Lothian steam coal at their command to suffice for the loading of 1500 tons on the 'Helge' within the running hours. The 'Helge' was berthed for loading after arrival, but was more than once unberthed because there was no more coal forward for loading her. Coal was forward from the Edinburgh Collieries Company, Limited, for other ships which they had undertaken to supply, and these ships got their coal. They were to some extent 'preference ships,' preferable because of running contracts under which they were periodically supplied by the Edinburgh Collieries Company. Mr Bonnington states that once a vessel is berthed for loading it is not the practice to unberth her in favour of a preference or other vessel if there is coal forward for her. And he further says that the reason why the 'Helge' was unberthed and delayed was that there was not sufficient coal forward for her, and that this was due to the effects of the strike, which delayed them in supplying all the ships which they had undertaken to supply. He says further that, but for the strike, they would have been able to give the 'Helge' the 1500 tons within the running hours, and I see no reason to doubt this. The pursuers' point, however, is that, owing to the latitude of time given to the colliery company in the defenders' contract with them, the company was under no obligation to forward coal for the 'Helge' at any given time prior to the end of July; that if the contracts had bound them to provide coal punctually for the 'Helge' when her arrival was notified to them, it is to be presumed that they would have fulfilled their obligation; and that it is not proved that if they had been so bound they could not have done so, notwithstanding the strike. I am of opinion that the pursuers' contention is right. The Edinburgh Collieries Company had enough Lothian steam coal at their command to suffice for loading 1500 had neglected to take. As it was, they gave the colliery company the right to postpone delivery till the end of the month, and the company took advantage of this option, with the result that the loading of the vessel was delayed.

 Danmark v.
 Poulsen & Co.

At advising on 10th July 1913,—

LORD DUNDAS.—It is common ground between the parties that, though the running hours prescribed by her charter-party for the loading of the “Helge” expired on the evening of 20th July, her cargo was not in fact fully loaded until the early morning of the 28th. The defenders further admit that if, under the circumstances, demurrage is due at all, which they deny, they are liable in the sum sued for by the pursuers. The question of legal liability as between the parties, in view of the admitted fact that the cargo was not fully furnished in proper time, is a difficult one to decide; but I have come to the conclusion that the interlocutor reclaimed against is right.

The material facts of the case lie within narrow compass; they are summarised by the Lord Ordinary, and I need not go over them again. The whole question turns upon clause 6 of the charter-party, which, shortly read, provides that “the parties hereto mutually exempt each other from all liability . . . arising from or for time lost through . . . strikes . . . or by reason of . . . any unavoidable accidents or hindrances beyond their control, either preventing or delaying the working, leading, or shipping of the said cargo.” The words are peculiar. They have not, so far as I am aware, been used in any charter-party which has been brought to the notice of the law Courts. Causes delaying “the working, leading, or ship-tons on the ‘Helge’ within the running hours. Having other ships to supply, and not enough coal for all, they might, in fact, have acted in one way or another in distributing the supply among them, even if they had undertaken to supply the ‘Helge’ punctually on her arrival. But I do not know what precisely were their contract obligations towards these other ships. And in the present question I think I must presume that, had the defenders taken them bound to supply the ‘Helge’ punctually on her arrival with the 1500 tons, they would have duly implemented their obligation. The evidence does not show that they could not have done so.

“Apart from the delay in shipping the 1500 tons from the Edinburgh Collieries Company, the 200 tons, which the defenders had made no bargain for with the Ormiston Colliery Company or otherwise, was not ordered until 26th July, and not shipped until 27th July. It is true that, owing to the strike, the defenders had difficulty in providing this part of the cargo after the Ormiston Company decided to supply only 800 tons. But they were, I think, at fault in making no more provision for this part of the cargo than a precarious one, dependent on the option of the Ormiston Colliery Company to supply it if it suited them to do so.

“On the whole matter I am of opinion that the defenders, on whom the onus lies, have not proved that the delay in loading the ‘Helge’ was due to the effects of the strike. It may be quite true to say that, but for the strike, the ‘Helge’ would have been loaded within the running hours. But, notwithstanding the strike, she might have been timeously loaded had the defenders made due provision for her being punctually supplied with cargo. This, in my opinion, they failed to do.

July 10, 1913. ping" of the cargo seem to me clearly to extend to something much wider than the mere loading; i.e., to things occurring in the "working" at the collieries, or the "leading" of the coal by train or otherwise from the pits to the harbour. This view is strengthened by words (not above quoted) in clause 6 about "accidents to mines or machinery, obstructions on railways and in harbours," &c. It was, I think, intended that the charterers should be protected in the case of some causes of delay not merely in the loading, but in the furnishing of, the cargo, e.g., a strike or a serious breakdown of machinery occurring at the pits from which the charterers had contracted to get their coal at the proper time, or the collapse of a bridge upon the only railway line of communication. In such cases I think the defenders would probably have had a good answer, upon their contract in the charter-party, to a claim by the pursuers in respect of consequent delay in furnishing the cargo, provided they had taken all reasonable measures in their power towards expediting its advance. But the question still remains whether, in the circumstances which have occurred, the charterers are not liable to the shipowners in demurrage arising from the delay in furnishing this cargo, in respect that they failed to take such measures.

Dampskibsselskabet
Danmark v.
Poulsen & Co.

Lord Dundas.

The Lord Ordinary has held, upon the evidence, that but for the strike among the coal-trimmers the "Helge" would probably have been duly loaded within the running hours; but also that, notwithstanding the strike, she might have been timeously loaded if the defenders had taken the collieries from which the cargo was to be supplied bound by their contracts to forward the coal in proper time. I think these conclusions are warranted by the evidence. The defenders' contract with the Edinburgh Collieries Company for the supply of 1500 tons is contained in the printed correspondence. I rather think the pursuers' counsel are right in their suggestion that the four documents, all dated 5th July 1911 and numbered 7, 8, 9, and 10 respectively, are not printed in strictly chronological order; and that the sequence of these should probably be 8, 10, 7, and 9. This matter is not made clear in the parole evidence, as it should have been; but I do not think it is very important. We must consider the correspondence as a whole in order to decide what, reading it according to the natural and ordinary meaning of the words used, is the true import of the contract. So reading the documents, I find it impossible to avoid the Lord Ordinary's conclusion that "the contract . . . gave the company until 31st July to supply the coal, apart from mutual arrangement." It is hardly necessary to say anything about the defenders' contract with the Ormiston Colliery. That company had clearly an option, which they exercised, of declining to supply more than 800 tons. But the coal which the defenders obtained elsewhere, in order to make up the remaining 200 tons, was all shipped before the full amount of the Edinburgh Collieries' contract was put on board; and the delay in loading thus really arose in connection with that part of the cargo.

It is, of course, well-settled law that (to use the often quoted words of Lord Blackburn in *Postlethwaite v. Freeland*¹) "in the absence of something to qualify it, the undertaking of the merchant to furnish a cargo is absolute." If he fails in that undertaking, he will certainly, apart from July 10, 1918. special contract, be liable in demurrage. For the contract one must look to the charter-party; and though, of course, a charter-party may be so framed as to exempt the charterer, under specified circumstances, from his absolute legal obligation, I think the exemption must be expressed in very clear language. The contract must, I apprehend, be strictly read. The Court will not lightly infer that the shipowner has agreed to relieve the charterer from liability for delays which he (the owner) has no possible means of preventing or lessening; still less for delays which the charterer himself could, by due diligence, have avoided. Where there is, as here in fact, a delay in furnishing the cargo, I think the onus is on the charterer to prove not only that the delay arose from one or other of the specified causes which, by the contract of charter-party, are to form grounds of exemption, but also that he did all in his power, by way of reasonable precaution or exertion, to avoid it. He is not entitled to fold his arms and do nothing, relying implicitly upon his clause of exemption. I may refer to the observations of Lord Esher, M.R., in Bulman,¹ and also to Gardiner v. Macfarlane, McCrindell, & Company,² where the charterers were not excused for their failure to have a cargo ready—withstanding their exemption clause—because the furnishing of the cargo was not rendered impossible by causes beyond their control; they failed to make arrangements to secure that they would get the coals in time, and the Court therefore held that they had taken the risk of anything occurring to prevent this.

Dampskibsselskabet
Danmark v.
Poulsen & Co.
Lord Dundas.

In the present case, even if it be assumed in the defenders' favour—and I do not think such an assumption could, upon the evidence, be justified—that they have proved that the strike was the causa causans of the delay, they would still, in my judgment, have to show that they had done everything they could reasonably be expected to do, in order to avoid the delay, and this, I think, the defenders cannot show. They did not, if I am right in my conclusion as to the true import of the contract, make a firm bargain with the Edinburgh Collieries Company for the timeous delivery of the coal—a precaution which they can hardly say would not have been a reasonable one to take, seeing that they maintain they intended to take it, and argue (I think erroneously) that they did effectually do so. The Lord Ordinary has held, and I think the evidence warrants him in so holding, that that company could, notwithstanding the strike, have supplied the full 1500 tons within the running hours, if they had been taken bound by their contract to do so. The defenders' counsel insisted that their clients, having secured by clause 6 of the charter-party, an absolute indemnity against all liability for delay in consequence of strikes, were not bound to have taken steps to avoid or lessen delay arising from that very cause—to neutralise, as they put it, the effect of the strike. I think the answer is that clause 6 did not furnish the defenders with an absolute indemnity. Such a clause of exemption, though it will avail to protect the charterer in many cases from liability which would otherwise have attached to him, when he has done his best to provide for the cargo being ready in proper time, will not, in my judgment, extend to relieve him from his inherent July 10, 1913. obligation to take all reasonable measures towards that end, and if he fails to do so, he must take the risk of consequences, if something happens, which might have been avoided, to prevent the due furnishing of the cargo. It seems to me that the true effect of the exemption clause is to alter the incidence of unavoidable loss as between two "innocent" parties, but that it does not extend to relieve the party originally responsible (the charterer) from his duty to avoid or minimise the loss by all means which he can reasonably adopt. The limits of that duty, in the particular circumstances of any given case, must in the last resort be determined by the Court, and the books abound in illustrations of the point (e.g., Richardsons,¹ *The "Alne Holme,"*² "Arden" Steamship Company, Limited,³ Carver on Carriage by Sea, (5th ed.) secs. 257(a), 258, 258(a), and cases cited). It seems to me that in the circumstances of this case the defenders fell short of their legal duty in failing to make a binding bargain with the collieries that the coal should arrive in due time for loading within the stipulated days. For the reason stated, I think we ought to adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against.

Lord Dundas.

LORD GUTHRIE.—The essential facts in this case are not in dispute. The defenders admit the period of delay alleged by the pursuers, and the amount of demurrage, if demurrage is due; and the pursuers admit the facts as to the duration and effect, direct and indirect, of the strike at Leith, the port of loading, on which the defence is founded.

The first question is one of construction. The delay to the "Helge," the pursuers' vessel chartered by the defenders to carry about 2550 tons of coal, loaded at Leith, from Leith to Cronstadt, arose from the action of the Edinburgh Collieries Company—who had contracted to supply 1500 tons of the cargo—in not forwarding the coals contracted for in time to enable the defenders to complete the loading by the evening of 20th July, the expiry of the loading days under the charter-party. Delay which occurred in connection with the balance of the cargo need not be considered, as the total delay and the pursuers' claim for demurrage would have been the same even if the balance of the cargo had been loaded within the loading days.

The question of construction arises under the contract between the defenders and the Edinburgh Collieries Company. The pursuers say that, whereas under the contract between them and the defenders, the latter had only till the evening of 20th July to load, the defenders' contract with the Edinburgh Collieries Company gave that company till 31st July. The defenders say that they intended to contract with the colliery company, so as to avoid any claim for demurrage under the charter-party, and Mr Poulsen admits that, if his view that they did so contract be right, the words "shipped this month" (which he says he did not notice till shortly before the proof) should not have been in the sale-note. I think the Lord Ordinary is right in holding that no such contract was made. There is no evidence that there would have been any difficulty in arranging with the Edinburgh Collieries Company for a 20th July limit. The terms of the sale-note of 5th

July, taken by themselves, are clear. The coal is "to be shipped this July 10, 1913. month, as may be mutually arranged. We do not undertake any liability for loading time unless under written guarantee." No doubt, in the case of a mercantile contract such as we are here dealing with, a sale-note like this, which is in the form of a letter, must be read along with the preceding and contemporaneous correspondence. But, so reading it, I cannot find any obligation on the Edinburgh Collieries Company to supply the coal earlier than 31st July, and the admitted facts, taken along with the correspondence, in whatever order the documents dated 5th July may be placed, negative Poulsen's suggestion that "as may be mutually arranged," referred to the name of the ship being communicated by the defenders to the Edinburgh Collieries Company. Such a communication could not be an "arrangement," and it would not explain the use of the word "mutually"; and, besides, the Edinburgh Collieries Company had received either previous or contemporaneous notice of the ship's name. "As may be mutually arranged," evidently refers to the amounts and dates of supply of coal, to be forwarded not later than 31st July. It is admitted that no written guarantee was given as to loading time; and it is not alleged that there was any contract between the parties, except what is contained in the documents.

Lord Guthrie.

If, then, the defenders failed to carry out their intention to bind the Edinburgh Collieries Company to supply coal so as to enable them to load within the loading days, was this, as the pursuers allege, the cause of the defenders' failure to implement their contract under the charter-party? It was a natural and sufficient cause; and I am of opinion that it was the true cause.

In these circumstances, the onus is on the defenders to prove that, even supposing they had made the contract with the Edinburgh Collieries Company which they intended to make, the delay would still have occurred owing to another cause, for the effects of which they are not liable under their contract with the pursuers. The defenders maintain that such a cause was constituted by a strike, lasting from the 5th to 12th July, of dock coal-trimmers and scutchers at Leith, from the effects of which, direct and indirect, they are protected by the strike clause in the charter-party, especially these words, "The parties hereto mutually exempt each other from all liability . . . arising from or for time lost through . . . strikes . . . either preventing or delaying the working, loading, or shipping of the said cargo, occurring on or after the date of this charter, until the expiration of the loading time." The facts of this case do not raise any question under the intervening part of the clause dealing with "unavoidable accidents and hindrances beyond their" (the charterers') "control."

The pursuers' replies are, I think, conclusive, namely, (first) the strike was over on 12th July, but, assuming that the defenders can found on the indirect effects of the strike, it is not proved that these lasted beyond 17th July, when the "Helge" gave notice that she was ready to load; and it is not proved that there was anything connected with the strike to prevent a certain amount of supply between the 12th and the 17th, and completion of the balance by the 20th. (Second) the pursuers have proved, by the supply of about 2000 tons of coal to the "Sir Walter Scott" and by other evidence, that the Edinburgh Collieries Company were in a position to July 10, 1913. supply the "Helge" with 1500 tons by the 20th; and—had this been necessary for the pursuers' case, which I do not think it is—the defenders have not proved that, had the Edinburgh Collieries Company been taken bound to supply the "Helge" by the 20th, they would not have done so, notwithstanding the strike. It is proved that there was neither deficiency of coal nor of wagons, nor delay by the railway company in sending off the wagons after receiving intimations from the merchants; and I cannot assume that the colliery company would not have fulfilled their contract obligations. I therefore agree with the Lord Ordinary that the defenders' failure to make a contract with the Edinburgh Collieries Company identical in respect of loading days with the contract in the charter-party, and not the strike, was the cause of the delay founded on by the pursuers.

Lord Guthrie.

But the defenders say that, but for the strike, the Edinburgh Collieries Company, even if only bound to deliver by 31st July, would have delivered by 20th, in ordinary course. I do not find this proved. At the best, it was only a probability, more or less great. It involved a risk, which the defenders were entitled to run if they chose, but which, as in a question with the owners of the ship, they were not entitled to add to the risk arising from strikes contemplated in the charter-party. The risk contemplated was from strikes alone, not strikes plus unwillingness on the part of the colliery, at probable loss to themselves, and without legal obligation, voluntarily and gratuitously to safeguard the defenders' interests. For aught that appears, the colliery company not only acted within their legal rights, but in the ordinary way of business, by fulfilling, in preference to the defenders' contract, orders which they could only have got on the footing that they were so fulfilled. The fact that, but for the strike, the natural consequence of the defenders' failure to make a proper contract with the colliery would probably have been avoided does not make the strike the cause of the defenders' breach of contract. The strike merely destroyed the defenders' chance of escaping the natural consequences of their action.

This view seems to me to follow from the cases referred to by Lord Dundas, and in particular from the cases of Gardiner,¹ Bulman,² and "Arden."³ In Gardiner's case¹ the charterers founded on the clause in the charter-party, exempting them from liability for the non-fulfilment of the contract on account of "dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, strikes, lockouts, or accidents at the colliery directed, or on railways, or any other hindrances of what nature soever beyond the charterers' or their agents' control." Owing to a strike, there had been an unusual demand upon the colliery with which they had contracted. It was held, notwithstanding, that the charterers were liable for demurrage. Lord Trayner said, "It has been clearly shown that the direct cause of the 'Lismore's' detention was that the charterers had no cargo to give her. Now the obligation to have or provide a cargo is not a charter obligation. The contract of charter-party presupposes that the charterer has a cargo or will have a cargo ready for the ship when the ship is ready for it. . . . Having thus ordered the coals for the 'Lismore' as well as for two other vessels which were named, the agents seem to have thought that they had done all that could be required of them. And, in ordinary circumstances, perhaps no more July 10, 1913.

 would have been necessary to enable them duly to fulfil their obligation to load the 'Lismore.' They took no precautions, however, to secure that they would get coals for the 'Lismore' in due time and took the risk of anything occurring which would prevent this. It is the chance so risked that has occurred . . . The charterers' agents could in May have contracted for the delivery to them of the coal ordered for the 'Lismore' by a certain day or within a certain number of days after the 'Lismore's' arrival. Nothing hindered them doing that, and if that course had been adopted it is to be presumed that the colliery so bound would have fulfilled its obligation, and no delay in loading the 'Lismore' would have occurred." In Bulman's case¹ the charterers were held exempt on account of a strike clause. Lord Esher said:—"A strike would in itself not be sufficient to exonerate the charterers from doing the best they could to accept delivery, and would not entitle them to fold their arms and do nothing. If, notwithstanding the strike, they could by reasonable exertion have taken delivery of the cargo within the proper time, the strike would not have afforded them any defence." And in the "Arden" case² where the clause, founded on in defence to an action for demurrage, referred to "any accidents or cause beyond the control of the charterers which may prevent or delay the loading," Lord President Dunedin said:—"I do not think the charterers escape under this clause of the charter-party. It seems to me that here they took their risk. As matter of fact, they did not make any contract by which they could be certain that the coals would come within the time they wanted them. I am not keeping out of view the fact that the representative of the Fife Coal Company stated that if he had been asked for a guarantee he would not have given one. That is his affair and the charterers' affair."

Lord Guthrie.

On the whole matter, I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be affirmed.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I, like Lord Dundas, felt at first that this case looked difficult, but on full consideration I concur in the judgment proposed by him. His opinion commends itself entirely to me as expressing the right view of the case. The Lord Ordinary seems to me to have given the only answer that could reasonably be given to the question put to him on the evidence, oral and documentary, that was before him. I therefore content myself with stating my concurrence in the opinion of Lord Dundas, in which he shows the grounds on which it must be held that the charterers cannot excuse themselves, seeing they did not do what they might have done to secure that their contract to supply the full cargo might be fulfilled. They failed sufficiently to secure that the collieries company should deliver in time.

I may add that my concurrence extends to the opinion just delivered by Lord Guthrie.

No. 149.

HUGH CAIRNS, Pursuer (Respondent).—Wilton.
 WILLIAM DAVIDSON, Defender (Reclaimer).—Keith.

July 11, 1913.

Cairns v.
 Davidson.

Trust—Proof of trust—"Deed of trust"—Deposit-receipt—Act 1696, cap. 25—Proof.

A deposit-receipt is not a "deed of trust" within the meaning of the Act 1696, cap. 25; and accordingly parole proof allowed in an action by a party for declarator that the sum contained in a deposit-receipt in the names of others truly belonged to him.

2D DIVISION.
 Lord
 Skerrington.

HUGH CAIRNS, miner, Hamilton, with the concurrence of his brother, Robert Cairns, residing in the United States of America, brought an action against William Davidson, miner, Larkhall, and the Clydesdale Bank, Limited. The conclusions of the action were for declarator that the pursuer had the sole right and title in and to a deposit-receipt for £260 granted by the Clydesdale Bank in favour of the defender William Davidson and Robert Cairns, and that the sum contained therein belonged in property to the pursuer; with further conclusions for payment and interdict.

The pursuer averred, inter alia, that on or about 18th October 1909 he was about to go to America and handed to the defender Davidson £360, "and asked him to deposit the said sum of £360 in bank upon a receipt in the names of the pursuer's brother, Robert Cairns, who was then residing in Hamilton, and of himself the defender William Davidson. The defender William Davidson agreed, and undertook to deposit the said sum in bank in the joint names of himself and of the pursuer's brother, and he agreed with the pursuer that the deposit-receipt, when obtained, should be retained by him for safe custody as agent or mandatary or custodier for the pursuer and against the instructions of the pursuer as to the further application of the sum so deposited. The pursuer gave him the sum of £1 in recognition of any trouble he might have. In the event of the death of the pursuer abroad, the defender William Davidson undertook at the time the said sum of £360 was handed to him that it would be divided by himself and the pursuer's said brother equally among the family of the pursuer in the absence of his other instructions by will or otherwise." This sum (the pursuer further averred) was deposited with the Clydesdale Bank by Davidson in the presence of Robert Cairns, the pursuer's brother, the deposit-receipt being taken in the names of Davidson and Robert Cairns; that the sums deposited with the bank were subsequently twice uplifted and redeposited in the same names, the deposit-receipts being held in each case by Davidson; that £100 of the original sum of £360 having been sent to the pursuer by Davidson, the sum in the deposit-receipt was £260; and that, although Davidson had possession of the receipt as "agent or mandatary or custodier for the pursuer," he refused to indorse and deliver it as requested by the pursuer.

The defenders the Clydesdale Bank, Limited, did not appear in the action, but defences were lodged for the defender Davidson. In these defences the defender admitted that in October 1909 the pursuer handed to him a sum of money in order that it should be under the charge of him and Robert Cairns during the pursuer's absence in America, but averred that the amount was £250; and further averred that when depositing this sum with the Clydesdale Bank he also lodged £110 of his own money, and that the deposit-receipt in name of Robert Cairns and himself was taken for the total sum of £360. July 11, 1913.

He also averred that he had always maintained his right to the sum of £110 of the £260 remaining on deposit-receipt, and refused to indorse and deliver the deposit-receipt except upon payment of £110. Cairns v. Davidson.

The compearing defender pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) The action is incompetent. (2) The pursuer's averments being irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons, the action should be dismissed. (3) The pursuer's averments, so far as material, are provable only by writ or oath.

The Lord Ordinary (Skerrington), after a hearing in the Procedure Roll, repelled the first, second, and third pleas in law for the compearing defender, and allowed the parties a proof of their averments on record.*

* "OPINION.—[After summarising the parties' averments]—These averments seem to me to raise a very simple issue of fact, but the defender's counsel argued that the action was entirely incompetent. He said that he construed the pursuer's pleadings as the averring of a contract of improper deposit, and that the pursuer's sole remedy, if he had one, was to bring an ordinary petitory action upon the footing that the defender was his debtor. He argued that in such a contract the property in the money passed and could not be vindicated by the depositor who had a mere claim of debt. I am inclined to agree with counsel in law, but I do not think that it has any application to the contract which the pursuer alleges. The averment which I have quoted seems to me to be an averment either of trust or of agency, namely, that the defender Davidson was to deposit the pursuer's money in bank in joint names of himself and Robert Cairns, and that they were to hold that deposit-receipt either as trustees for him or as his agents. Upon the question of proof it may be of vital importance whether the case is one of trust or of agency, but I have no hesitation in repelling the defender's first plea, that the action is incompetent. I am equally clear that a perfectly relevant case has been stated by the pursuer, and that therefore the defender's second plea also falls to be repelled.

"The defender's third plea raises the question whether the pursuer is restricted in his proof to writ or oath, and the defender's counsel founded upon the statute 1696, c. 25, which requires that trust shall be proved only by writ or oath. I do not think it necessary to form a decided opinion upon the question whether the pursuer's averments do or do not amount to trust, or whether he has made a relevant averment of agency as distinguished from trust. My present impression is that his real case is trust. But then any difficulty as to the mode of proof is obviated by the fact that the defender does not stand upon the terms of the deposit-receipt as truly expressing his legal right to the contents thereof. The apparent creditors in the deposit-receipt are the defender Davidson and Robert Cairns, and accordingly if we are to look at nothing but the deposit-receipt, the result would be that each of the gentlemen would be the owner of £130. But that is not the defender's case at all; he says that he is owner only of £110, and he further admits that the pursuer is owner of £150 and that Robert Cairns is not entitled to one halfpenny of the money. In these circumstances, even if the case be one of trust, the well-known principle which was applied in the case of Grant v. Mackenzie, (1899) 1 F. 889, comes in, and, as both parties are agreed that the title does not accurately express their legal rights, no alternative remains but to allow a general parole proof.

"The defender's counsel offered an alternative argument to the effect that the contract averred was really one of loan. If that were so, proof would have to be limited, but it seems to me that the contract averred was something entirely different. I shall accordingly repel the third plea in law and allow parties a proof in ordinary form. . . ."

July 11, 1913. The defender reclaimed, and the case was heard before the Second Division (without the Lord Justice-Clerk) on 27th and 28th June 1913.

Cairns v.
Davidson.

Argued for the reclaimer;—The action was an action of declarator of trust. Trust was defined by Lord M'Laren in his work on Wills and Succession,¹ and by Lord President Inglis in Croskery v. Gilmour's Trustees,² and according to these definitions what the pursuer here set forth on record was a trust. This being so, the proof must be by writ or oath.³ The deposit-receipt was a deed of trust within the meaning of the Act 1696, cap. 25,⁴ and the fact that one of the defenders admitted the trust did not, in a question with the other defender, exclude the application of the Act.⁵ The cases founded on by the pursuer in the Outer House—Hotson v. Paul,⁶ Grant's Trustees v. Morison,⁷ and *Grant v. Mackenzie*⁸—were distinguishable. They were not cases of trust. They were cases of actions to enforce contracts, in which, as the parties did not stand on the documents, parole proof was allowed.

Argued for the respondent;—The defender was sued as a mandatory and not as a trustee, and the ground of action being mandate, proof by parole was admissible.⁹ But, even assuming that the action were held to be in substance a declarator of trust, the Act 1696, cap. 25, did not apply, because (1) a deposit-receipt was not a deed of trust—it set forth the contract with the bank but did not purport to regulate the ownership of the money¹⁰; and (2) the defender had on record admitted that part of the money belonged to the pursuer.¹¹

LORD SALVESSEN.—In this case I have come to agree with the Lord Ordinary in the result at which he arrives, although I prefer to put my judgment upon different grounds. The argument for the defender was that the deposit-receipt for £260 in the joint names of himself and Robert Cairns, having been so taken by the instructions of the pursuer, is a deed of trust within the meaning of the Act 1696, cap. 25. If this proposition is well founded it is difficult to see how a proof at large can be competent even although there is an admission that to the extent of £150 the money contained in the deposit-receipt is the property of the pursuer. Mr Keith in July 11, 1913. his able argument went far to satisfy my mind that the case of *Grant v. Cairns v. Mackenzie*¹ has no application to a case to which the Act 1696, cap. 25, Davidson. applies. In *Chalmers v. Chalmers*² it was held not a sufficient ground for Lord Salvesen. admitting parole evidence, to prove a trust alleged to be constituted by an ex facie absolute conveyance of heritage, that the conveyance admittedly proceeded on a false narrative of a price paid, and I cannot see that the admission by the defender here that part of the contents of this deposit-receipt belonged to the pursuer is not quite consistent with his defence that the remainder belonged to himself and was included in the same deposit-receipt for his own convenience. The case of *Grant*¹ merely decided that, when a written contract relating to heritage is admitted by both parties to it not to express the true agreement between them, parole evidence is admissible to prove what the true contract was. The exclusion of such evidence where parties have embodied their contract in a formal writing rests upon a different principle and has no statutory sanction. Assuming, therefore, that the deposit-receipt here constituted a deed of trust within the meaning of the statute, I should hesitate to hold that parole evidence could be allowed because of the defender's qualified admission.

It is not, however, necessary to decide this point, for I have come to be of opinion that a deposit-receipt is not a deed of trust within the meaning of the Act 1696, cap. 25. Such a receipt no doubt gives the holder in whose name the money has been deposited a right of action against the bank who issued it. So far as the bank is concerned the only person who can demand payment is the holder in whose name it is made out, and to whom they have bound themselves to make payment. Unless they have been interpellated from making payment they have no answer to his demand, and his indorsation is a good discharge. But the deposit-receipt is not conclusive evidence of the ownership of the money deposited. As Lord M'Laren said in the case of *Anderson*³ the receipt "may prove nothing more than this, that the true owner has deposited money under an arrangement with someone, by which that party, it may be the wife or child or agent of the depositor, is empowered to uplift the money." One is familiar with the case of a fund which is the subject of a litigation being deposited by arrangement between parties in the joint names of the solicitors who act for them. It would be rather startling if in such a case the solicitors could not be called upon to denude without proof by writing under their hands that the money truly belonged to the parties or one of them. The truth is that the Act primarily applies where (as the editor of Bell's Principles⁴ expresses it) "for some reason of convenience and by agreement of parties the documents of title to some property have been taken in the name of the trustee though the beneficial right is really in the other party to the arrangement." Now a deposit-receipt is not a document of title in this sense. It is true that in one case—*Dunn v. Pratt*⁵—it was held that the Act applied to missives of sale; and that, as the alleged trustee was authorised to complete the purchase in his own name, the averment of trust could only be proved by July 11, 1913. his writ or oath. It is to be noticed, however, that there was a vigorous dissent by Lord Kinneir, and I should not be surprised if the decision in that case required at some future date to be reconsidered. At all events, I do not think that the decision covers such a document as a deposit-receipt. It was conceded that if the money had been simply deposited with the defender his liability to account for it could be established by parole evidence. It follows that if after having so received it he had deposited it in bank without special authority the Act would not apply. But it was said that a different result must be reached where the money is handed to him with an instruction to deposit it in his own name for behoof of the true owner. The distinction is a subtle one, and does not carry conviction to my mind. Once it is assumed that deposit-receipts are often used to enable the agent of the true owner to deal with the money for his behoof the principle upon which the Act 1696, cap. 25, is based has no application. Where a title to land or to scrip is taken in the name of any person the presumption is that it is so taken because he has the ownership of the property thus absolutely transferred to him. The same thing does not apply to a deposit-receipt except as in a question between the bank and the payee named in it. There is no authority which favours such a contention, and the consequences of so holding might operate great injustice in many cases.

I have hitherto dealt with the matter on the assumption that the defender's name was the only one mentioned in the deposit-receipt. The case is, however, much less favourable for him. The deposit-receipt is payable only on the joint signature of Robert Cairns and the defender. Robert Cairns makes no claim to the money, and is a consenting party to the action being raised. It has never yet actually been decided whether in a proper deed of trust in favour of two trustees, where one admits the existence of the trust and the other denies it, the latter shall still have the benefit of the limitation of proof enacted by the Act 1696. In my opinion, however, it cannot be so, for one of two joint payees can qualify no right, as in a question with the bank, to any particular part of the deposit-receipt. The security that the true owner has where a deposit-receipt is so made is that he cannot be defrauded except by both of the payees acting in concert. If, therefore, proof by writ was not forthcoming against the defender, and his oath were negative of the reference, there would be a resulting impasse, for the money would still be retained by the bank until Robert Cairns authorised payment, and in an action against him by the defender to compel him to concur in a discharge to the bank it would be perfectly open to him to plead that the money truly belonged to the pursuer.

On the above grounds I have come to be of opinion that we must allow the parties a proof of their averments on record. It will be just as easy for the defender, if he has an honest case, to prove that part of the contents of the deposit-receipt in question belonged to him as it will be for the pursuer to establish that it is all his money.

LORD GUTHRIE.—It is sufficient for the decision of this case to hold as Lord Salvesen has done that the deposit-receipt is not a deed of trust in the sense of the statute of 1696, chapter 25. But I am not prepared to differ from the Lord Ordinary, where he says,—“Even if the case be one of trust, July 11, 1913. the well-known principle which was applied in the case of *Grant v. Mac-Cairns v. kenzie*¹ comes in, and as both parties are agreed that the title does not Davidson. accurately express their legal rights, no alternative remains but to allow a Lord Guthrie. general parole proof.”

I concur also in the separate ground not founded on by the Lord Ordinary on which Lord Salvesen has proceeded, namely, the specialty in this case that the deposit-receipt was in favour not only of the defender William Davidson but of Robert Cairns, the pursuer's brother, who not only adopts a different attitude in regard to the nature and reality of the transaction from the defender, but is a consenting party to the action.

LORD DUNDAS.—I concur, but I reserve my opinion on the matters on which Lord Salvesen has expressed doubts.

The Act 1606, cap. 17, has fallen into desuetude.

Deakin v. Milne, (1882) 10 R. (J.) 22, commented on.

Observations on the extent to which a statute may fall into partial desuetude.

Burgh—Use of streets—Powers of magistrates—Proclamation prohibiting holding meetings in streets—Act for staying unlawful conventions (Act 1606, cap. 17).

The Magistrates of Edinburgh issued a proclamation prohibiting the holding of meetings in certain streets of the city, unless a licence to do so had been previously obtained, and imposing penalties for a breach of the proclamation. The form of licence granted by the magistrates bore to be issued in virtue of the powers conferred by the Act 1606, cap. 17.

A street orator, who had been convicted of a breach of the proclamation, brought an action for declarator, inter alia, that the magistrates had no authority to issue the proclamation, and that he was not bound to obey it.

The Court granted the declarator, holding (1) that the Act 1606, cap. 17, was in desuetude, and (2) that the magistrates were not empowered by common law or by any other statute to issue such a proclamation.

Observations (per the Lord President) as to the powers of magistrates to prevent, by means of the police, any conduct tending to interfere with the paramount use of the streets for passage or to lead to a breach of the peace; and as to the right of the public to hold meetings in the streets.

July 12, 1918. ON 21st September 1912 John M'Ara, residing in Edinburgh, brought an action against the Lord Provost and Magistrates of the city of Edinburgh concluding (1) for declarator " (but always under reservation of the powers of the said defenders or any of them, under statute or common law, to regulate traffic and suppress disorder), that the defenders, the said Magistrates, or alternatively any of them, had and have no warrant or authority to issue, and the pursuer was not at 19th or 21st July 1912, and is not now, bound to obey a proclamation, notice, or order" prohibiting, under penalties, the holding of meetings in certain public places in Edinburgh without a licence; (2) for declarator that the defenders had no authority to issue licences for the holding of such meetings, containing certain conditions; (3) and (4) for interdict against the defenders issuing proclamations or licences in the terms complained of; and (5) for payment of £250 as damages for wrongous arrest and imprisonment.

1st DIVISION.
Lord
Skerrington.

The pursuer averred :—(Cond. 1) " The pursuer is a cork-cutter to trade and resides at No. 3 Guthrie Street, in the city of Edinburgh. He is interested in social, political, and religious questions, and has held meetings in Edinburgh with his fellow-citizens for the discussion of such questions for many years. He is one of a large number of politicians, reformers, and street preachers who do so in Edinburgh and throughout the Kingdom and Colonies connected therewith. . . ." (Cond. 3) " From time immemorial and as they believe in pursuance of or in accordance with their constitutional and common law rights as citizens and lieges, numbers of the indwellers of Edinburgh have been in use to hold meetings on the evenings of weekdays and on the afternoons and in the evenings of Sundays in certain open spaces in the city of Edinburgh in order to discuss political, religious, and social questions. . . ." After averring that the defenders had resolved to silence the pursuer because the doctrines advocated by him were obnoxious to them, he further averred :—(Cond. 8) " After the defenders discovered that they possessed no powers other than those conferred by common law or police statutes, with reference to the use of the streets by the lieges, they decided to carry out their policy of suppressing speakers, restricting the number of meetings, and discriminating between different classes of individuals and societies who might be allowed to hold meetings in the streets and open spaces in the city, by reverting to the statute 1606, cap. 17, and invoking its obsolete powers.* . . . (Cond. 11) "Knowing full well that their powers were limited to their common law and statutory powers exclusive of said statute, the defenders the said Magistrates, or some of them, in or about the regards the pursuer and other lieges highly oppressive, invidious, and

(2) That no Meetings shall be held within these areas, except between the hours of 2 and 10 o'clock P.M., without the special permission of the Magistrates being granted therefor. (3) That the persons responsible for such meetings shall observe and conform to these and to any additional conditions which the Magistrates may from time to time make and intimate to them. of £2 was deposited by his friends. . . .” The pursuer further July 12, 1913. averred that he was charged in the City Police Court with a breach of the proclamation, and the case was remitted to the Burgh Court; ^{M'Ara v. Magistrates of Edinburgh.} that he was tried in the Burgh Court on a charge that for the first time also contained a charge of breach of the peace; and that he was convicted of breach of the proclamation, but not of breach of the peace.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The statute 1606, cap. 17, having been superseded by contrary usage, and being now in desuetude, the pursuer is entitled to decree of declarator and interdict as concluded for. (2) The said proclamation being without warrant and ultra vires, the pursuer is entitled to decree of declarator and interdict as concluded for. (3) Separatim, the pursuer having by constitutional law and usage the right in common with His Majesty's lieges to converse with and to fellow-citizens on matters of public interest on the streets and open places of the city as long as private right and public order are observed, the said proclamation and licence are ultra vires and illegal, and the pursuer is entitled to interdict and declarator. (4) The defenders, the said Magistrates, having intimated that they will prosecute the pursuer and his fellow-citizens if they hold meetings in said open spaces without a licence in accordance with said unwarrantable and illegal proclamation, the pursuer is entitled to decree of declarator and interdict as concluded for. (5) Said licence, et separatim, said conditions of licence proposed and issued by the defenders, the said Magistrates, as condescended on, being ultra vires of said defenders, the pursuer is entitled to decree of declarator and interdict as concluded for. (6) The defenders, the said Magistrates, having wrongfully, maliciously, and without probable cause, caused the pursuer to be arrested and incarcerated, and the pursuer having been wrongfully arrested and incarcerated by the said officers of police acting under or at the instigation of the said defenders, he is entitled to reparation as concluded for.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The action is incompetent and excluded in respect of the statutory method of review provided by the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908. (2) No title to sue. (3) The pursuer's averments are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons, so far as directed against these defenders either as Magistrates or as individuals, and the action should therefore be dismissed as against them. (4) In respect that the pursuer has no right at common law or under statute to use the streets, and in particular those at the Mound or in the neighbourhood thereof, for the purpose of addressing meetings, the action should be dismissed. (5) The statute 1606, cap. 17, not having fallen into desuetude nor having been superseded as alleged, these defenders should be assoilzied. (6) The said proclamation being legal and intra vires of these defenders, they are entitled to decree of absolvitor. (7) The said form of licence settled on 19th July 1912 and the form of licence settled on 25th July being legal and intra vires of these defenders, these defenders should be assoilzied.

On 29th January 1913 the Lord Ordinary (Skerrington) pronounced an interlocutor which, after repelling the second plea in law for the defenders and their first plea, so far as regarded the conclusions of the summons for declarator and interdict, proceeded:—“Finds and declares that the Magistrates of the city of Edinburgh were not empowered by the common law or by any statute to issue the proclama-

He further allowed the pursuer to lodge issues with regard to his claim of damages, and granted leave to reclaim.*

M'Ará v.
Magistrates
of Edinburgh.

* "OPINION.—[After narrating the averments of parties and the conclusions of the summons]—The pursuer has taken no steps to set aside the judgment of the magistrate convicting him of a breach of the said proclamation. His counsel explained that his client wished, if necessary, to obtain a judgment of the House of Lords as to the legality of the proclamation. Further, there is a decision of the High Court of Justiciary which presents a difficulty in the way of the pursuer, and he thought that he would have a better prospect of success in a Civil Court. The defenders' first plea in law is as follows:—'The action is incompetent, and excluded, in respect of the statutory method of review provided by the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908.' The defenders' counsel explained that this plea was intended to apply only to the conclusion for damages, and accordingly, it must be repelled, in so far as regards the conclusions for declarator and interdict.

"The defenders' second plea in law is 'No title to sue.' The Magistrates of Edinburgh have issued a proclamation threatening their fellow-citizens with penalties, but they now wish to avoid a judgment as to its legality. I do not understand this policy on their part or why the pursuer should not have a title to challenge the legality of a proclamation which attempts to stop a practice which he has pursued for years without objection upon the part of the Civic Authorities. The defenders' counsel argued that the only remedy open to a citizen who objected to the proclamation was to disobey it and to plead the illegality in defence to a prosecution. This argument seems to me contrary to good sense and to good order. I do not see why, in order to obtain a judgment upon a purely legal question, a citizen must expose himself to arrest and imprisonment, or why the Magistrates must be exposed to claims of damages. As regards this matter the observations of Lord Robertson in Rossi v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, (1904), 7 F. (H. L.) 85, pp. 89-90, are in point. The defenders' counsel admitted that it was not necessarily illegal to hold a meeting on a highway (Burden v. Rigler, [1911] 1 K. B. 337), but he argued that no one can have an absolute legal right to hold a meeting on a road or street. If the pursuer had claimed such a right I should have sustained his title to sue, but I should have assoilzied the defenders upon the ground that no such right exists. In his third plea in law the pursuer claims a right to converse with his 'fellow-citizens on matters of public interest on the streets and open places of the city as long as private right and public order are observed.' If he had asked for a declarator of such a right I should have sustained his title to sue, but I should have dismissed the conclusion as too vague, and upon the ground that it was impossible and incompetent for the Court of Session to try to regulate the right of the citizens of Edinburgh to the use of their streets. The matter is one for the Local Authorities, and all that this Court can do is to protect the citizens against illegal actings on the part of their rulers. I construe the pursuer's first conclusion as a challenge of the legality of the proclamation though it contains a reservation of the defenders' power 'to regulate traffic and suppress disorder,' which seems to me quite unnecessary. I do not propose to follow the defenders' counsel in his able and learned argument as to the nature and extent of the right of the public to the use of a road or street. I merely say that I dissent from the view that the public have only a bare right of passage over a country high-

Division on 11th, 12th, 19th, and 20th March, and on 21st May 1913.

Argued for the reclaimers;—(1) The proclamation in question was within the powers conferred on the Magistrates by the Act 1606, cap. 17, which was still in force. It was not suggested in the works of Hume or Alison¹ that that Act was in desuetude, and it had been before the Court as recently as in Deakin v. Milne.² The fact too that it had been left unrepealed by the Statute Law Revision Acts showed that it was regarded as still in force. Though there had certainly been toleration of meetings in the streets for many years, it did not follow that there had been any abrogation of the right of the Magistrates to prohibit meetings under this Act whenever they deemed it necessary. An Act too might be in partial desuetude by reason of adverse possession, but outwith the limits of that possession it would continue to be in force for all purposes. The respondent had entirely way or over the streets of a burgh. It is a question of fact whether any particular use of a road or street is reasonable, and different considerations may apply to country roads and to streets in burghs. The decision of the House of Lords in Galbreath v. Armour, (1845) 4 Bell's App. 374, does not support the argument of the defenders' counsel. I accordingly repel the plea of 'No title to sue.'

"The Magistrates maintain that their proclamation was justified by the Act 1606, cap. 17. This statute and the earlier statutes dealing with the same topic are referred to or commented on in Mackenzie's Observations on the Acts of Parliament (1686), pp. 105, 169, 325-6; Kames's Statute Law of Scotland (2nd ed., 1769), s.v. 'Mob,' p. 224; Erskine's Institutes (1773), iv. 4, 29; Hume on Crimes (3rd ed., 1829), vol. 1, pp. 416, 430-4, 557-8; Allison's Principles of the Criminal Law (1832), vol. 1, pp. 528-9. The Act 1606, cap. 17, is quoted verbatim in condescendence 9, and the following points may be noted in regard to it:—

(1) It ratifies all former Acts 'for staying of all tumults and unlawful meetings and convocations within burgh.' According to Hume (vol. 1, p. 416), what is now called 'mobbing' used to be called 'the tumultuous convocation of the lieges.' In his opinion, what was struck at by these Acts was not so much sedition, as Erskine thought, but rather the crime of rioting and convocation, the objects of which are local and private rather than general (pp. 430-1 and 557-8). No doubt, however, seditious meetings fall within the purview of the Acts. The earlier statutes, which apparently are the ones referred to in the Act, are three in number, and they are summarised as follows by Lord Kames:—'Convocating of the lieges within burgh discharged, under the pain of confiscation of moveables, and the lives of the transgressors to be at the King's will, 1457-77, 1491-34. Convocations or meetings in arms within burghs, without licence from the king or magistrates, to be punished with death, 1563-83.'

"(2) The Act 1606, cap. 17, makes a very remarkable 'addition' to the earlier legislation by enacting that no persons within burgh shall 'convocate or assemble themselves together on any occasion except they make due intimation of the lawful causes of their meetings to the Provost and Bailies of that burgh and obtain their licence thereto so that nothing be done or attempted by them in their said meetings which may tend to the derogation or violation of the Acts of Parliament laws and constitutions made for the weil and quietness of the said burghs declaring by these presents the said unlawful meetings and the persons present thereat to be factious and seditious and all proceedings therein to be null and of no avail and the said

July 12, 1913. failed to prove what was necessary to justify the Court in holding that this Act had fallen into total desuetude.¹ (2) Apart, however, from the Act of 1606 the Magistrates had a general power at common law to make proclamations, because they were the recognised fountain of knowledge as to the sovereign will, as, for instance, on the occasion of a King's accession. They had also power to preserve peace in the streets, and to prohibit the use of streets for any but the primary public purposes, and to regulate their use for these purposes.² This proclamation, therefore, was within the powers of the Magistrates, and the Court would not interfere with their actings unless it were shown that they had in some way acted ultra vires.³ This proclamation invaded no right acquired by the public, for, though meetings had been held in the past without hindrance within the area dealt with in the proclamation, such use, even if exercised without obstructing persons to be punished in their bodies goods and gear with all rigour conform to the laws of this realm.' This new enactment imposes upon the inhabitants of burghs a positive duty to intimate to the Magistrates the purpose of any proposed meeting, and to obtain their sanction to the holding of the meeting. Failing obedience, it renders unlawful meetings of a kind which otherwise would have been lawful. Contravention of the statute is declared to be constructive sedition. According to Erskine (iv. 4, 23), the words used in the statute are 'seldom or never stretched to a capital punishment.'

"(3) After ordaining that the whole inhabitants of the burgh shall assist the Magistrates to put down unlawful meetings, the Act 'ordains publication to be made hereof at the market crosses of the said burghs that none pretend ignorance thereof.' This Act derogates, according to Mackenzie, from the general law contained in the Act 1581, c. 128, which was to the effect that the lieges should be bound to obey the Acts of the Scottish Parliament on the expiry of forty days from the publication thereof at the Market Cross of Edinburgh. On the principle, omnia præsumentur solemniter acta, it must be assumed that the Act 1606, c. 17, was duly proclaimed in all burghs as ordered. No further or renewed publication was required by the Act in order to make it binding upon the lieges, nor is any further publication averred to have been made in Edinburgh. The Act does not authorise or contemplate the issue of Proclamations by the Magistrates.

"The language of the 'addition' is very general, and may be construed so as to include all meetings within burgh, whether in the open air or within a building. Mackenzie says that it has been doubted whether keepers of conventicles within burgh may be punishable by this Act, but which resided in the Magistrates to make proclamations carried with it all powers necessary to enforce their orders, and it was immaterial that the penalties attached to contravention of such proclamations were not defined.² The jurisdiction which the Magistrates exercised within the ancient royalty of the city of Edinburgh (which, as extended, embraced the area in question³) had been specifically preserved,⁴ and their powers were not limited to those conferred by local Acts. Further, the pursuer had mistaken his remedy in seeking declarator that he was not bound to obey the proclamation, his proper remedy being by way of suspension of a conviction in the High Court.

The respondent's argument founded on the special powers conferred on the Magistrates by certain local Acts did not affect the disposal of this case, for there was no conclusion in the present action with reference to such special powers, and accordingly the Court should find this doubt is founded merely upon the fact that there were later statutes, now repealed, which specially mentioned and prohibited conventicles within houses and in fields. It may, I think, be assumed that the Act 1606, c. 17, is now in desuetude as regards meetings within private buildings, but meetings in the open air are in a different category, because they may lead to obstruction of the streets, breach of the peace, and mobbing, and rioting. Further, if the Act is still in force, it may also be assumed that the punishment for contravention would now be very different from that contemplated by its authors. Authority for the proposition that Scottish statutes may fall into partial desuetude will be found in some of the opinions in the case of Bute v. More, (1870) 1 Couper, 495, 9 Macph. 180. These opinions are of great weight and authority, but they were merely obiter, seeing that the only judgment of the Court was to the effect that a contravention of the old statutes anent the profanation of the Sabbath could not competently be tried under the Summary Procedure Act, 1864. This decision was followed in the case of Nicol v. M'Neill, (1887) 14 R. (J.) 47, but both Lord Young and Lord M'Laren said that in their view it was an open question whether these statutes were or were not in desuetude.

"The question whether the Act 1606, c. 17, is still in force depends primarily upon the construction which ought to be given to the decision of the High Court of Justiciary in the case of Deakin v. Milne, (1882) 5 Couper, 174, 10 R. (J.) 22. That case may be quoted as an authority for the proposition that the Act is not in desuetude, or, alternatively, for the proposition that the Magistrates of a burgh have power at common law to issue a proclamation prohibiting a meeting, with the result that any person who disobeys is guilty of a substantive offence. I have come to the conclusion that the Judges (Lord Justice-Clerk Moncreiff, Lord Young, and Lord Craighill) did not intend to affirm either of these propositions. The facts were as follows:—In the Royal Burgh of Arbroath the processions of the Salvation Army had led to opposition, and an antagonistic army, called the Skeleton Army, had been raised. There had been street fights within the burgh, and people belonging to both armies had been brought before the Magistrates and fined. The Magistrates, finding that the evil continued, and that the processions led to 'riotous proceedings, and are

Argued for the respondent;—(1) The Act of 1606 was in desuetude.¹ Its purpose was to make all meetings unlawful except those sanctioned by the Magistrates, but meetings had for long been held in all burghs regardless of the Act, and it had never been referred to in recent years except in the case of Deakin v. Milne.² In that case the conviction was sustained quite independently of the Act, as was explained in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary in the present case. When the Act of 1795 for "Preventing seditious meetings"³ (which was subsequently repealed) was passed it was clear that the Act of 1606 was not regarded as still in force, for otherwise the later Act would not have been required. Even if the Act of 1606 were still in force it gave no powers for adjecting conditions to the licences, or for imposing likely to cause a breach of the peace,' issued a proclamation prohibiting all processions of the Salvation Army, and giving notice that persons taking part therein would 'render themselves liable to prosecution.' Certain persons who were members of the Salvation Army were charged in the Police Court with 'the crime of breaking the public peace, as also of a breach of the terms of a proclamation made and published by the Provost and Bailies of Arbroath, on the 17th day of March 1882, by virtue of the powers conferred on the Provost and Bailies of the said burgh by the Act of Parliament passed in the reign of James the Sixth, in the year 1606, cap. 17, actors or actor, or art and part.' It was objected that a charge of breach of a proclamation was not a nomen juris according to the law of Scotland, and also that the Act 1606, cap. 17, was in desuetude. These objections were repelled, and the accused were convicted of both offences, and fined. An appeal was taken upon a case stated, and one of the questions for the Court of appeal was whether the appellants 'were properly convicted of an offence punishable by a Magistrate of the burgh, in consequence of violating the provisions of the said proclamation issued in virtue of the powers conferred upon the Magistrates by the said Act, James the Sixth, in the year 1606, cap. 17, or otherwise in virtue of their powers as Magistrates of Arbroath on the occasion libelled?' The High Court, without answering any of the questions, dismissed the appeal, and affirmed the 'determination of the inferior Judge. Counsel for the appellants argued that the Act was in desuetude, but none of the authorities bearing on this branch of the law were cited on either side. In reply, counsel for the respondent argued that there was 'no authority for the contention that the Act of 1606 is in desuetude. The issuing of the proclamation and the institution of the prosecutions were quite legal, and were proper and necessary acts on the part of the Magistrates. The offence is charged, and the proclamation is referred to in the complaint, more for the purpose of showing that the principal offence, viz., the breach of the peace, was committed after due warning had been given to the appellants, and so charged more as an aggravation of the first offence; and it is perfectly relevant.' Each of the Judges expressed the opinion that the proclamation was within the powers of the Magistrates, but none of them made any reference to the Act of 1606: I read the opinions as meaning that in the special circumstances the Magistrates had power to prohibit a procession which was likely to cause a breach of the peace. The Lord Justice-Clerk said that the breach of the proclamation was 'a municipal offence,' but I do penalties. (2) If the Act of 1606 was no longer in force the Magistrates had no common law powers to which they could appeal in support of their proclamation. Indeed, if they had such powers the Act of 1606 would not have been required and would never have been passed. The community had, in addition to the right of free passage, a right to the reasonable use of the streets for purposes which included the holding of peaceful meetings. If a peaceful meeting of the citizens was not per se an offence against the law, it could not become such by reason of a proclamation by the Magistrates. Meetings having been held during past years within the areas described in the proclamation in question, without any breach of the peace having occurred, the Magistrates were acting ultra vires in issuing such a proclamation as would ab ante make lawful meetings unlawful, and so bar a plea of ignorance of the illegality of such meetings.¹ The pursuer was not seeking to enforce any right but that of meeting, subject to good order, not think that he or the other Judges intended to affirm that disobedience to the proclamation was a substantive offence apart from breach of the peace. It is noteworthy that the present Lord Justice-Clerk, who was counsel for the respondent in the case of Deakin, refers to that decision in his Treatise on the Criminal Law of Scotland (1894, 3rd edition, p. 326), merely for the purpose of showing the modus in which a charge of breach of the peace may be made. In the case of Hutton v. Main, (1891) 19 R. (J.) 5, the present Lord Justice-Clerk referred to the case of Deakin in terms which indicate that in his view the case was simply one of breach of the peace. It should be noticed that the complaint in the case of Deakin was not for contravention of the Act of 1606, cap. 17, but for breach of the proclamation. The person who framed the complaint had read the case of Bute v. More, and knew that a prosecution for contravention of the statute would be incompetent under the Summary Procedure Act, 1864.

"No other example was cited of a prosecution founded on the Act 1606, c. 17. Neither that Act nor the earlier statutes as to unlawful convocations are referred to in Macdonald's Criminal Law of Scotland. When one goes back to Hume, Alison, and Erskine, it is remarkable that not one of these writers makes any reference to the addition to the previous law which was effected by the Act of 1606. Hume says that the fundamental law is the Act of James II., 'which the others only reintegrate.' Though the terms of the 'addition' are correctly stated by Kames and Mackenzie, I am disposed to think that from a very early period it met the fate of legislation which is too stringent, and that it was simply disregarded. However that may be, it is, I think, certain that both at the present day and as far back as the memory of man can carry, the offence prohibited by the Act is and was 'not only practised without being checked, but is no longer considered or dealt with in this country as an offence against the law.' I quote from the opinion of the Lord Justice-General (Inglis) in Bute v. More. It is not the practice for persons who intend to hold an open-air meeting within burgh to intimate the purpose of their meeting to the Magistrates and to obtain their licence. In the case of Hutton v. Main, already referred to, the Lord Justice-Clerk said,—'Street preaching is a familiar thing. Respectable persons gather, sing in order to attract the attention of those near, and thereafter preach to them.' Other meetings in the open-air within burgh are equally free and informal. No example was adduced of a case in which the Magistrates of Edinburgh, or of any other burgh, had either given or withheld a licence for a meeting. The defenders' counsel argued that as licences need not be in writing, it must be assumed that the Magistrates impliedly licensed all the meetings which have been held within burgh during the last century. This argument overlooks the whole end and object of the 'addition' to the Act of 1606, which was that previous intimation should be made to the Magistrates in order that they might consider and decide whether a particular meeting ought to be sanctioned. The defenders' counsel founded upon the Statute Law Revision (Scotland) Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 38), which schedules for repeal the three earlier statutes as to unlawful convocations, but does not schedule the Act 1606, c. 17. No inference one way or the other can be drawn from this omission. The object of the Act was to prepare the way for a revised edition of the statutes and not to solve legal difficulties or to effect any substantive change in the law. Accordingly, the Act repealed expressly and specifically certain enactments which had ceased to be in force or had become unnecessary. In view of the case of Deakin, it was for the Court and not for the Statute Law Revision Act to determine whether the Act of 1606 was or was not in desuetude.

July 12, 1913. for a lawful purpose in a lawful manner. That right he derived from the common law rights of individual liberty of the person and liberty of speech.¹ Nor was he proposing to do any act that would produce unlawful acts by other persons.² Further, the Magistrates had no power to add to their proclamation the sanction of a penalty, and as the proclamation was vitiated by that addition it was vitiated altogether. It was further vitiated by the proposal to issue licences, because the Magistrates had no power, as they claimed here, to issue licences that would permit certain persons to obstruct the public streets. The Magistrates had, in point of fact, selected the wrong procedure. If their object was to prevent obstruction of the streets, they had powers defined in their municipal Acts whereby that object might be lawfully attained.³ They might attain it by an issue of bye-laws,⁴ provided they conformed to the conditions and qualifications affecting such an issue.⁵ The appeal to section 364 of the Edinburgh

"Apart from the Act of 1606 the Magistrates have no power to institute a licensing system in order to prevent 'annoyance, disorder, and obstruction' or even breach of the peace, consequent upon the holding of meetings upon the Mound. Any person convicted of causing an obstruction on a foot-pavement or thoroughfare, or of conduct, which, if continued, would produce reasonable apprehension of 'the breaking up of the social peace' may be fined or ordered to find security for his future good behaviour—Ferguson v. Carnochan, (1889) 16 R. (J.) 93; Wise v. Dunning, [1902] 1 K. B. 167; Edinburgh Act of 1879, sec. 246 (19) and (20), as amended by Act of 1891, sec. 80 (11); Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908, secs. 43 and 50. The proclamation, if effectual, would dispense with the necessity of both trial and conviction, and would subject a citizen to disabilities merely because the Magistrates in their private room had come to the conclusion that his conduct was calculated to produce obstruction or breach of the peace. I can figure nothing more arbitrary or unconstitutional. For the purpose of preserving the public peace, the Magistrates of Edinburgh have, in addition to the powers pertaining to Magistrates, the powers of

Act of 1879 did not help the reclaimers, for that section only preserved their existing powers, and they had failed here to show that they had any such power as they now claimed, either at common law or under their charters or by statute.¹ It was true that Warning Notices might be issued for the guidance of law-abiding citizens, but there was no resemblance between such notices and proclamations that professed to make lawful acts unlawful. The pursuer had a good title to sue.² He had adopted the only course which was open to him by seeking declarator, not of a right of meeting, but of a right of freedom from arrest in a place where he might lawfully be.

LORD PRESIDENT.—On the 19th July 1912 the Magistrates of Edinburgh issued a proclamation which, after a certain preamble which I need not

Justices of the Peace and of Sheriffs—Wright v. Bell, (1905) 8 F. 291, pp. 310, 314. I assume that if they thought it necessary they might lawfully issue a proclamation prohibiting the holding of any meetings which in their opinion were likely to lead to a breach of the peace, and that they might warn the citizens that persons who disobeyed would be liable to prosecution for obstruction and breach of the peace. But they could not lawfully threaten the citizens with penalties for contravening their proclamation. I asked the defenders' counsel to explain what were the penalties referred to in the proclamation. He pointed to section 27 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. cap. 65), which enacts that 'where any Court has power to take cognisance of offences, the penalties attached to which are not defined, the punishment for such offences shall be regulated by that applicable to common law offences in such Court.' It would follow that the punishment for breach of the proclamation if prosecuted in the Police or the Burgh Court would be a fine not exceeding £10, and failing payment, imprisonment not exceeding 60 days (sec. 7); and if prosecuted in the Sheriff Court, a fine not exceeding £25, and failing payment imprisonment not exceeding three months, or imprisonment for the same period without the option of a fine (sec. 11). These penalties are much more severe than those imposed by the Act of 1879 for municipal offences of a similar character. By sections 242 and 243 of the Edinburgh Act of 1879 the Magistrates have power to regulate the traffic in the streets; to prescribe the route for public processions, &c., and every person guilty of a breach of such order or regulation is liable to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings. The same penalty is imposed for obstructing a foot-pavement or thoroughfare (section 246 (19) and (20); Act of 1891, section 80 (11)). Again the Magistrates and Town-Council have power with the approval of the Sheriff to make bye-laws, inter alia, 'for preventing nuisances and annoyances in any street or court' (Act of 1879, sections 308 and 309 (1)) under the same penalty. The proclamation was a usurpation by the Magistrates of the right which belonged to the citizens of Edinburgh as represented by the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Councillors to regulate the use of the streets so as to benefit so far as possible the community as a whole. At common law 'in matters of police, or of common concernment to the community, the Magistrates and Town-Council must concur, as the full representatives of the community. In this capacity they make bye-laws not repugnant to the laws of the realm or set of the borough' (Ersk. i. 4, 22).

All persons contravening this order are liable to the penalties set forth in the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908." The pursuer of the present action did proceed to hold a meeting without having obtained the licence of the Magistrates. He was apprehended, and was convicted of having contravened the terms of the proclamation. He was convicted, but he was only admonished; no penalty was imposed on him. He did not try to suspend the conviction in the High Court of Justiciary, but he brought this civil action in which he asked for certain declarators. I need not go through the declarators for which he asked, because I am only concerned now with the declarator which he got from the Lord Ordinary. The Lord Ordinary "finds and declares that the Magistrates of the city of Edinburgh were not empowered by the common law or by any statute to issue the proclamation mentioned in the summons, and that the pursuer was not at 19th or 21st July 1912, and is not now, bound to obey said proclamation, and decerns"; and then there are certain other parts of the decree which it is not necessary to mention. The whole question which was argued before your Lordships upon the reclaiming note has been whether that finding of the Lord Ordinary was right or was wrong. I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary has come to a just conclusion, and he has accom-

As I have already mentioned, the Corporation of Edinburgh has not only delegated, with consent of Parliament, certain of its powers to the Magistrates, but has also subjected its common law power of making bye-laws to statutory regulation. It would be a fitting question for the consideration of the Town-Council whether those citizens who derive edification, instruction, or amusement from street preachers ought to be allowed to gratify this taste on the Mound, although other members of the community may object to the inevitable noise and crowd and to occasional coarse language. Even if the judgment of the Town-Council were adverse the pursuer would be entitled to be heard by his counsel or agent before the Sheriff allowed any bye-law prohibiting meetings on the Mound. The proclamation rides roughshod over these rights and liberties.

"I shall find and declare that the Magistrates were not empowered by the common law or by any statute to issue the proclamation mentioned in the summons, and that the pursuer is not bound to obey it. It is unnecessary to pronounce any further declarator or to grant interdict. As regards the conclusion for damages the pursuer has stated no relevant case against the Corporation, but he was entitled and bound to call them as parties interested in the other conclusions. I shall repel the first and second pleas stated for the Corporation. I shall sustain the third plea (irrelevancy) so far as regards the conclusion for damages, and to that extent I shall dismiss the action so far as directed against the Corporation. As regards the Magistrates I shall allow the pursuer to lodge an issue without pronouncing any decision as to the competency or relevancy of his claim of damages. The defenders' counsel cited the case of Gilchrist v. Anderson, 1 D. 37; but Wood v. North British Railway Company, 1 F. 562; Wilson v. Bennett, 6 F. 269; and McCreadie, 1907 S. C. 1176, seem more in point."

panied his judgment with a very careful and learned note, with nearly all July 12, 1913. of which I concur, the only two passages on which I shall have something ^{M'Ara v.} to say I shall mention presently. But I think it necessary to add a few ^{Magistrates} words, because I wish it to be most distinctly understood that, while I ^{of Edinburgh.} agree with the Lord Ordinary, I am not to be held as concurring with much ^{Ld. President.} of the argumentative statement which is to be found in the pleadings of the pursuer.

The justification for the proclamation was rested by the learned counsel for the defenders (first) upon the common law, and (second) upon the statute of 1606. I shall take these two points separately.

As regards the common law, I wish most distinctly to state it as my opinion that the primary and overruling object for which streets exist is passage. The streets are public, but they are public for passage, and there is no such thing as a right in the public to hold meetings as such in the streets. That brings me to one of the few points on which I think it necessary to say something as to what the Lord Ordinary has said, because in one view of what he has said I should not agree. The learned Lord Ordinary, after saying that if the pursuer had claimed an absolute legal right to hold a meeting on a road or street he would have assoilzied the defenders upon the ground that no such right existed—a proposition with which I agree—goes on to say this: “I merely say that I dissent from the view that the public have only a bare right of passage over a country highway or over the streets of a burgh.” Well, in one view of that I do not agree. On the other hand, I am not sure that there is really any difference between the views of the Lord Ordinary and my own. What I mean is this: streets are for passage, and passage is paramount to everything else. That does not necessarily mean that anyone is doing an illegal act if he is not at the moment passing along. It is quite clear that citizens may meet in the streets and may stop and speak to each other. The whole thing is a question of degree and nothing else, and it is a question of degree which the Magistrates are the proper persons to consider in each case, and it is for them to take such measures as are necessary to preserve to the citizens in general that use which is paramount to all other uses of the streets. I say this because there is a good deal in the pursuer's pleadings about what he calls “exercising his right of free speech in public places.” Now the right of free speech undoubtedly exists, and the right of free speech is to promulgate your opinions by speech so long as you do not utter what is treasonable or libellous, or make yourself obnoxious to the statutes that deal with blasphemy and obscenity. But the right of free speech is a perfectly separate thing from the question of the place where that right is to be exercised. You may say what you like provided it is not obnoxious in the ways I have indicated, but that does not mean that you may say it anywhere.

I am not going to deal with what may be the case in open spaces or public places. It seems to me that no general pronouncement upon that subject could be made, because, although for convenience sake one often speaks of open spaces or of public places, the truth is that open spaces and public places differ very much in their character, and before you could say whether a certain thing could be done in a certain place you would have

July 12, 1913. to know the history of the particular place. For example, there may be certain places which are dedicated to certain uses, as was laid down in the well-known judgment of Lord Watson in the case of Grahame v. Magistrates of Kirkcaldy,¹ and things that otherwise were lawful might be restrained if they interfered with the purposes of that dedication. Each of those cases must be dealt with when it arises. Here we are dealing with a street proper, because this place at the Mound is just one of the streets of the city. It is a thoroughfare, although, probably, not a very much used thoroughfare at that particular corner. In such a place there is not the slightest right in anyone to hold a meeting as such. On the other hand, if a man chooses to stop on the street and speak, and the Magistrates, as the best judges of that matter, do not think he is doing any harm, there is no particular reason why he should be interfered with. But the Magistrates, as the proper conservators of the street, have got to consider two things: (first) whether what is going on in the streets is at all likely to interfere with what I have said is the paramount use of the streets—the right of passage; and (secondly) whether what is going on is likely to lead to a breach of the peace. In either of those cases it seems to me that they have an absolute right via facti by means of the police to move the people on who are causing the obstruction. They may move them on if the congeries of persons who have gathered round is such as to prevent an ordinary peaceable citizen getting along the street as he wishes to do. But I also think, if they find a person speaking in such a way as is calculated to incite other persons to commit a breach of the peace, they have a right to move him on, not because the right of free speech can be questioned, but because he is doing something which is likely to make a breach of the peace in the streets for the proper conduct of which the Magistrates are responsible. But I think their right is necessarily limited to dealing with him via facti. I am not speaking of the actual commission of breach of the peace. That is a common law crime which can be prosecuted in the ordinary way. But conduct which is such as to cause an apprehension of breach of the peace may be dealt with via facti. There are many cases which one can easily think of without going into any speculations as to what this particular pursuer may have been saying. There are certain allegations made on record about that; but as there has been no proof, I hold my mind a perfect blank as to what the subjects of discourse were, or how they were handled by the pursuer. But I certainly know this—and I am entitled to know it from the experience of public life—I know that there are certain districts in certain cities in which a very large majority of the population hold a certain faith, or a certain form of faith, and I know that if a person, lecturer or preacher, holding other views, went there and promulgated his opinions as regards that faith, although he has a perfect right to hold these opinions, and although, in a proper place, he has a right to express them, his doing so in that particular neighbourhood would certainly lead to a breach of the peace. Now that is a case where, if a man took up his stand and began his discourse on such lines, the Magistrates would, I think, be entitled at once to move him on.

While I have thought it necessary to say that—because I wish it to be July 12, 1913. very clearly understood that the Magistrates are the natural conservators of M'Ara v. our streets in this matter, and that the citizens are not to be harried by the Magistrates holding of meetings which interfere with their progress, or which lead or of Edinburgh. are likely to lead to breach of the peace—yet it does not seem to me in any Ld. President. way to justify this proclamation, because, although the Magistrates have the power of moving a person on, and although also they might issue what might, in one sense, be called a proclamation, but which would be really a notice to say that they found certain objections to meetings in such and such a place, and that they proposed to move on anyone who stood there, that does not give them the power of creating an offence and fencing it with a penalty. In doing that they seem to me to have taken upon themselves a power which only the Legislature can give. And the fatal blot of this proclamation, so far as sought to be based on the common law, seems to me to be that they created an offence, and proposed to impose penalties whenever the offence which they thereby created was committed.

So much for the common law. I only mention, to show that I have not forgotten it, that, of course, over and above what may be called the common law powers, there are certain powers which the Magistrates have by statute in connection with the framing of bye-laws. I need not go into that, because that is dealt with statutorily. There are certain safeguards before the bye-laws are passed, but admittedly this proclamation was not issued in respect of any bye-law.

Then I go to the Act of 1606. No doubt the Act of 1606, if you take it by itself, does authorise this proclamation; but I have myself no doubt whatsoever that the Act of 1606 is in desuetude. And here is the only other point on which I think it necessary to say I do not quite agree with one expression of the Lord Ordinary, although I agree in the result to which he has come. He considers that, without doubt, the statute is in desuetude as regards meetings within buildings, but that meetings in the open air are in a different category. Then he says that, in some of the opinions in Bute v. More,¹ “authority for the proposition that Scottish statutes may fall into partial desuetude will be found.” I am not quite sure that he agrees with that, but it is merely to make sure that there shall be no doubt about it that I venture to express my opinion to this effect. I think it is possible that a statute might be partly in desuetude and partly not, where portions of the statute were separable—that is to say, the statute might deal with two matters, and as regards one matter it might be in desuetude and as regards the other it might not. But I cannot conceive that a statute could be partially in desuetude in respect of its application. What is prohibited under the statute of 1606 is a meeting without the authority of the magistrates. Well, that statute must be either in observantia or in desuetude. I do not think it can be in observantia as regards one class of meeting and in desuetude as regards another. If that is so—if you cannot split the statute in its application—then it seems to me clear that it is in desuetude, because we all know that the habit of public meeting has existed now from time immemorial, certainly ever since the enhanced

July 12, 1913. political activity which may be said to have come in since the Reform Act of 1832 ; and with regard to all the meetings, on all the subjects, political and otherwise, that have been held since those days, no one ever heard of an application being made first to the magistrates for a licence to hold any one of them. Accordingly I hold that the statute of 1606 cannot form the basis for the proclamation.

Ld. President.

Upon the whole matter I have come to the conclusion that the Lord Ordinary's decision is right, and should be adhered to.

LORD KINNEAR and LORD JOHNSTON concurred.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I agree with the conclusion reached by the Lord Ordinary.

The proclamation of 12th July 1908 is said to be warranted by the Act 1606, cap. 17, and also by the common law.

The Act of 1606, cap. 17, is, in my opinion, in desuetude. To hold otherwise would be to affirm that no persons can assemble themselves together on any occasion within burgh without first going to the provost and bailies, intimating the lawful cause of their meeting, and obtaining their licence. No body of persons, and no meeting, whether in a private house or public building, in private grounds or public park, is exempt from the prohibition of the statute, which is universal in its terms. It is impossible to construe the statute in any but the widest sense. It was argued that although it would be impossible to apply the statute to meetings held within four walls, and that to this extent the statute must be held to be in desuetude, yet it is only in partial desuetude, and the case of *Bute v. More*¹ was referred to. Even assuming that when a statute prohibits A, B, and C, it may be in desuetude as regards A, and yet effective against B and C, that is not the nature of the prohibition here. The prohibition is not of different acts, but of one act, i.e., assembling, under any conditions. For this reason it is impossible to distinguish between one kind of meeting and another. It applies to all or to none. This statute cannot be regarded as in partial desuetude only. The decision in the case of *Deakin*² founded on by the defenders did not involve a recognition of the Act of 1606. The appellants there had been guilty of a breach of the peace, and of breaking the terms of the proclamation which had been issued by the magistrates. The proclamation in that case was different from the one here, for it merely prohibited certain processions, on the ground that they were leading to riotous proceedings and were likely to cause a breach of the peace. The ground of judgment there was not the Act of 1606. If the proclamation here had been in these terms the case upon the common law aspect of it would have been different. There is no warrant, in my opinion, for the Magistrates in the exercise of their common law powers prohibiting all meetings in the places specified in the proclamation, until licences have been obtained. Still less could they attempt to adject penalties for the infringement of the proclamation.

I am, however, clearly of opinion that the powers of the Provost, Magistrates, and Council at common law are not limited, in the way suggested in the argument for the pursuer, merely to what is contained in the Municipal Acts.

They are vested with the administration of the public streets, both within the July 12, 1913. ancient and the extended royalty, including the space in question in the present action. They could, if they thought right, prohibit any meeting being held there; or they might issue a notice prohibiting the holding of certain meetings as likely to lead to a breach of the peace. It would be the duty of the police to enforce their orders, and if anyone obstructed the police in the execution of their duty he would be prosecuted for that. I am, however, unable to take the view that, if meetings are allowed at all, any meeting can be prohibited except upon the ground that it is calculated to cause obstruction or breach of the peace.

Proof—Witnesses—Credibility—Opinion of Judge who heard witnesses—Duty of Court of appeal. Christie v. Lyburn.

Observations as to the duty of a Court of appeal to form an opinion for itself upon questions of fact submitted to review, and as to the weight to be attached to the opinion of the Judge who saw and heard the witnesses.

On 30th June 1911 Annie Christie brought an action of filiation and aliment in the Sheriff Court at Perth against James Lyburn. 1st DIVISION. Sheriff of Perth.

The Sheriff-substitute (Sym), after a proof, granted decree against the defender, and on appeal the Sheriff (Johnston) affirmed that interlocutor.

The defender thereupon appealed to the Court of Session, and the case was heard before the First Division (without Lord Johnston) on 18th and 19th June 1913.

At advising on 12th July 1913 the following observations were made with regard to the weight to be given to the opinion of the Judge of first instance,—

LORD MACKENZIE.—This action of affiliation and aliment comes up on appeal under unusual circumstances. The Sheriff-substitute, who saw and heard the witnesses, has held the pursuer's case proved. The Sheriff on appeal has affirmed this judgment, but states in his note:—"In affirming the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor in this case, I am not to be taken as giving his finding, should the case go further, the weight which the Supreme Court is sometimes disposed to attach to the concurrent judgment of both Sheriffs. If it had fallen to me to decide the case in the first instance upon the evidence as recorded, my judgment would have been the other way." This course, as the Sheriff explains, he followed from his desire to give effect to recent decisions in the House of Lords as to the effect to be given to the opinion of the Judge of first instance in dealing with questions of evidence. The Act of Parliament does, however, give litigants a right of

July 12, 1913. appeal on questions of fact, and if, after giving all due weight to the impression produced by the witnesses on the Sheriff-substitute who took the proof, the Court to whom an appeal lies consider that the case is not proved their duty is to give effect to this opinion. [His Lordship then examined the evidence and stated his reasons for holding that the pursuer had failed to prove her case.]

Lyburn.

Lord Mackenzie.

The LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

LORD KINNEAR.—I only wish to add that I agree with the view expressed by Lord Mackenzie as to the course which the learned Sheriff has thought it right to follow in this case. Whether an appeal should be allowed or not upon questions of fact is not for the Courts but for the Legislature to determine. And so long as an appeal on a matter of fact is allowed, it is the plain duty of the Judge of appeal to apply his own mind to all the materials of fact which may be brought before him, and to pronounce his own judgment. I do not think a Judge of appeal, before whom a question of fact is properly laid, is entitled to withhold the benefit which the law gives to the person aggrieved by the judgment below, and to refuse to give his own opinion upon the evidence. Of course, he may attach—as we always do attach—the greatest possible weight to the opinion of the Judge who has seen and heard the witnesses, and there may be particular facts upon which the Court of appeal may reasonably accept the opinion of the Judge simply because it is his; but that is only when it is apparent from the judgment that he has been moved by considerations which cannot be brought fully, if at all, before the Court of appeal. It is a totally different thing to say that the Judge of appeal is to suppress his own perception of the probabilities of conduct and results out of deference to the very judgment which it is his duty to review.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutors of the Sheriff and the Sheriff-substitute, and assoilized the defender.

ADAM JOHNSTONE, Pursuer.—G. Watt, K.C.—MacRobert.
THE PROVOST, MAGISTRATES, AND COUNCILLORS OF THE BURGH OF LOCHGELLY, Defenders.—Constable, K.C.—Lowson.

Johnstone v.
Magistrates
of Lochgelly.

Reparation—Negligence—Safety of the public—Dangerous article—Unfenced rubbish heap in field frequented by public—Injury to child—Liability of person using, but not owning, the field.

A father brought an action of damages against a burgh authority for the death of his daughter, under three years of age, who had received fatal injuries through her clothes becoming ignited at a fire burning upon a rubbish heap or "coup" where the burgh rubbish was deposited. He averred that this coup was situated in a grass field in the neighbourhood of his house and was not fenced off from the field, nor was the field sufficiently fenced to exclude the public, who in fact used it as a public park, and that children were in the habit of playing upon the coup, all of which was known to the defenders. He further averred that it was the practice of the defenders, or of those for whom they were responsible, to collect and burn inflammable material upon the coup, and that this practice had been followed by rag-pickers, with the July 15, 1913. acquiescence of the defenders. He alleged fault on the part of the defenders, in respect that they had failed to fence the coup or field or to take other precautions to exclude the public therefrom, and had failed, the coup being unfenced, to watch and properly extinguish fires which might be lighted thereon.

Johnstone v.
Magistrates
of Lochgelly.

Held that these averments were irrelevant to found an issue against the defenders, in respect (1) that it appeared therefrom that the defenders were not the owners of the field or coup, and had therefore neither the right nor the duty to fence them; and (2) that the material which they put upon the ground was not dangerous in itself but only became so when ignited, and there was no averment that the defenders, or those for whom they were responsible, had kindled the fire in question.

Lowery v. Walker, [1911] A. C. 10, distinguished.

IN June 1912 Adam Johnstone, a miner residing at Launcherhead, 1st Division. Lochgelly, brought an action in the Sheriff Court of Fife and Kinross at Dunfermline against the Provost, Magistrates, and Councillors of the burgh of Lochgelly, in which he claimed the sum of £500 as damages for the death of his daughter, aged two years and nine months, which he alleged had been caused by the fault of the defenders.

Sheriff of Fife
and Kinross.

The pursuer averred that behind the house which he occupied at Launcherhead there was a large grass park, at the lower end of which was a considerable area which was used by the defenders as a "coup" for depositing the rubbish brought from the burgh of Lochgelly.

He further averred:—(Cond. 3) "Said grass park is accessible from the south by an entry about 20 feet wide, between two rows of houses in Launcherhead. There is no gate or other obstacle to prevent persons getting access to said park by said entry, and the entry is in fact habitually used by the public as an access to said park, which is treated as a public park. . . . There is no fence of any description to cut off the said coup or refuse depot from the other part of said park, which is all in grass. On the west side of said park, and extending from the pursuer's said dwelling-house, alongside of said grass park and coup, and bordering the road leading to the Cartmore Farm, there is a barbed-wire fence about 4 feet in height. Said fence is, and has been for at least five years past, in a very bad state of repair, and is so much broken down that it is possible to walk between most of the pairs of paling stobs without difficulty, and without being impeded by the wire of the fence. Further, there was originally a large wooden gate, such as is usual for the entry to a grass field, which opened on to the centre of said coup or refuse depot. Said gate, which would be about 15 feet long, has been for some years, and still is, lying broken flat on the ground, with the result that between the two paling stobs, which originally formed the support for said gate, there is an open entry of about 15 feet. There are many other breaks in said fence between said gate and the dwelling-house occupied by the pursuer, which are at least 5 feet in extent. . . ." (Cond. 4) "Amongst the other refuse which is daily deposited at said coup or refuse depot, there is always a large quantity of paper, rags, and other inflammable material got from the various dustbins which are emptied daily by the servants of the defenders, the Provost, Magistrates, and Councillors of the burgh of Lochgelly, or of those for whom they are responsible. In par-

July 15, 1913. Johnstone v. Magistrates of Lochgelly. ticular, the refuse from various shops in the lower part of the town of Lochgelly is deposited in said coup. As a consequence of the daily deposit of said refuse, the paper and other inflammable material becomes detached, and is blown about said park, along said footpath, until it reaches the houses fronting the Station Road of Lochgelly. It is also apt to be blown up to the houses occupied by the pursuer and others in Launcherhead. In order to obviate the trouble and annoyance to occupiers of said houses, it has been the practice of the defenders, or of those for whom they are responsible, and of those whom they permit to use the said coup or refuse depot, to collect the papers and other inflammable material together at any one point on said coup and to burn them. This has in particular been a regular practice by the rag-pickers, who have frequented said coup for many years. No objection has ever been offered by the defenders, or by those for whom they are responsible, to the burning of said rubbish, though they knew, or could not fail to be made aware of the fact, that said papers and other inflammable material were so burned at irregular intervals. Further, the pursuer believes and avers that the carters employed by the defenders for the collection and depositing of said refuse had, and still have, instructions to make a fire and burn the papers on the said coup whenever they had or have occasion to think that the papers and other refuse were or are blowing about and causing annoyance to the occupiers of the houses in the Station Road or in Launcherhead. Explained that on 27th March 1912, subsequent to the accident to pursuer's child afterwards condescended on, one of the defenders' carters named Paterson, acting upon instructions from defenders, or of those for whom they are responsible, set fire to some paper and other refuse on said coup and left it burning. Previous to the accident pursuer and his wife were unaware that burning refuse was ever left unattended on said coup." (Cond. 5) "Said grass park, which is open to all the occupiers of the houses in Launcherhead and in the Station Road of Lochgelly, is the usual playground for the children of the residents there, and as there are often articles deposited in said coup which the children make use of for playthings, they are induced to go on to the coup in search of such things as picture-books, pencils, rubbers, and other small articles. This practice of the children in the neighbourhood has been well known to the defenders, the Provost, Magistrates, and Councillors of the burgh of Lochgelly or their servants for many years, and no objection was ever made by them to the children or other members of the public frequenting said park or going to said coup or refuse depot until after the accident hereinafter condescended on. In particular, the police never attempted to warn the children away from said coup or refuse depot." (Cond. 7) "On Monday, 18th December 1911, and about 12 o'clock forenoon on that day, pursuer's child, Isabella, aged two years and nine months, was playing in pursuer's dwelling-house with another child of a like age. As it was a bright day, pursuer's wife gave the children some sweets and told them to go along to the house of her mother (the grandmother of the child Isabella), who resides at the other end of the row of four houses of which the pursuer's house forms one, and close to the opening leading to the south end of said grass park. As the children had often gone to the grandmother's house in similar fashion, the pursuer's wife did not watch to see that they went into her mother's house. After the children left the house pursuer's wife went on with her domestic duties for another quarter of an hour or twenty minutes, and then shut the door of her own house and went along to her mother's house. She had just reached her mother's house, and had seen the children were not there, when another playmate of pursuer's child came running up from the coup, and shouted that Isa was burning. Pursuer's wife at once ran to the coup, where she discovered her child with most of her clothes in flames. She extinguished the flames, and brought the child to the house, and sent for the doctor. Dr Dickson arrived in a few minutes, but on examination he said there was no hope of recovery, and the child died about four hours later."

July 15, 1913.
Johnstone v.
Magistrates
of Lochgelly.

The grounds on which the pursuer sought to fix liability on the defenders were stated as follows:—(Cond. 8) "Said accident occurred through the fault or negligence of the defenders, the Provost, Magistrates, and Councillors of the burgh of Lochgelly, or of those for whom they are responsible. The defenders or their servants were well aware that said coup was not fenced off from the other portion of the grass field of which it is a part on the south and east sides thereof, and they are also aware that the fence which originally bordered said grass park and coup on the west side thereof was in a ruinous condition, and also that the gate, which was originally put in said fence for the convenience of their carters in entering said coup, was at the time of the accident, and for some years previous thereto, lying broken, flat upon the ground. They were also aware that the children of the occupiers of the houses in Launcherhead and in the Station Road were, at the time of the accident and for years previous thereto, in the habit of going to the coup in search of playthings, and that said park was used as a thoroughfare between Station Road and Cartmore Farm Road. They were also aware that their servants had instructions to burn the papers and other inflammable material found among the refuse when these became so numerous as to cause annoyance to the householders in the district, and they knew, or ought to have known, that these instructions had been acted upon, and that their servants gathered the papers together and set fire to them as occasion required. They also knew, or ought to have known, that the rag-pickers, who frequented the coup, had been in the habit of burning papers and other material on said coup. If the defenders had taken reasonable precautions to avoid the occurrence of an accident, they would have seen that said coup was properly fenced off from the other portion of said park, and also that the children in the neighbourhood were warned away from the coup, and made aware that they had no right to play about it or to go there in search of playthings. No notice of any kind was exhibited at said coup. The defenders ought also to have taken precautions to ensure that, so long as said coup was not fenced or protected, any fires kindled thereon should have been properly watched while there was any material burning, and they ought to have instructed their servants to see that any fire was properly extinguished before they left the coup. The defenders, however, failed to take all or any of these reasonable precautions, and the accident, whereby the pursuer's said child, Isabella, lost her life was a direct and natural consequence of their negligence to take reasonable precautions for the safety of the children and others whom they knew to be in the habit of playing about the coup and frequenting said park." (Cond. 9) "In particular, said accident resulted from the fault or negligence of the defenders, the Provost, Magistrates, and Councillors of the burgh of Lochgelly, or their servants, in failing to see that a fire, which had

July 15, 1913. Johnstone v. Magistrates of Lochgelly. been lit on said coup on the morning of 18th December 1911, was properly extinguished by their servants, or those whom they permitted to light fires there. The defenders' said carter, Paterson, was aware that said fire was burning, and failed to see that it was extinguished. The death of pursuer's child was caused by her clothes catching fire from burning paper or other material on said coup. If the defenders had taken reasonable precautions such an accident could not have happened. Explained that said refuse coup was in itself dangerous, being strewn with broken earthenware, glass, and other materials liable to cause injury to persons walking thereon, and, in addition, said coup was dangerous to the public health."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The defenders, the Provost, Magistrates, and Councillors of the burgh of Lochgelly, having been the authors and users of said coup or refuse depot, there was a duty upon them in the circumstances condescended on to take precautions to prevent danger to children and others frequenting said coup or refuse depot, which they negligently failed to take, and the death of pursuer's child having resulted from such failure, all as condescended on, they are liable to the pursuer in damages. (4) The accident, whereby the pursuer's child lost her life, being a direct result of the fault or negligence of the defenders, or of those for whom they are responsible, decree should be granted as craved, with expenses.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia, that the pursuer's averments were irrelevant.

By interlocutor, dated 8th November 1912, the Sheriff-substitute (Umpherston) sustained the defenders' plea of irrelevancy and dismissed the action.*

On 25th January 1913 the Sheriff (Morison) sustained an appeal against that interlocutor, and remitted to the Sheriff-substitute to allow a proof before answer.

After sundry procedure the Sheriff-substitute, on 6th May 1913, allowed a proof before answer, and on 12th May 1913 the pursuer required the cause to be remitted to the Court of Session.

The case came before the First Division (without the Lord President) on 24th June 1913, when the pursuer moved the Court for an issue in ordinary form for the trial of the cause before a jury. The defenders opposed the motion on the ground that the pursuer's averments were irrelevant.

Argued for the defenders;—It was not averred that the defenders were proprietors of the field or coup, indeed it was clear from the averments that they were mere licencees or users of them, and had therefore neither the right nor the duty to fence them. Nor had the pursuer made any relevant averment of circumstances which put upon the defenders a duty of protecting the public from the fire which had caused this accident. It was not a trap or dangerous attraction in the sense of the decisions on this point. Granted that the coup was an attraction, it did not become dangerous until the material deposited there by the defenders was interfered with by third parties. In this respect the case was clearly distinguishable from that of Lowery v.

* After the action was raised the pursuer was allowed to add as defenders thereto the proprietor and tenant respectively of the grass park in question, but the action, in so far as directed against these parties, was dismissed in the Sheriff Court, and the pursuer did not ask for an issue against either of them in the Court of Session.

Walker,¹ which was relied upon by the pursuer. The case of Cooke July 15, 1913. *v. Midland Great Western Railway of Ireland*² was that which most nearly resembled the present, but that case was also distinguishable in respect that the danger to be apprehended there was from the machine in the condition in which it was when put upon the ground by the defendants. The material which the defenders had put upon this field was innocuous, it was only when kindled that it became a source of danger, and there was no averment—indeed the pursuer had deliberately refrained from making any averment—which connected the defenders with the lighting of the fire in question or attributed to them knowledge of its existence. The grounds of decision in the numerous cases cited for the pursuer really told in favour of the defenders' contention.

Argued for the pursuer;—The defenders had brought the material in question on to the field in the knowledge that it was frequented by the public, including children; the coup and the material thereon were an attraction to children; further, part of the material had to be destroyed in order to avoid the creation of a nuisance, and the defenders were in the habit of destroying it by fire, and of acquiescing in this being done by others. They had therefore knowingly allowed a danger to remain in this field, which they knew was frequented by the public, and were liable for the results of the accident caused thereby³; or they had created or acquiesced in the creation of a danger in a place where none was before, and had a duty to protect the public from that danger, even though it was upon private property or the property of another.⁴ It was immaterial whether the public frequented the place in virtue of any right; it was sufficient if the fact of their frequenting the place was known to the defenders.⁵ Nor did it affect the liability of the defenders that the thing put by them upon the ground did not become a danger until tampered with by the injured party or by a third party.⁶ Persons who introduced dangers or dangerous material into public or semi-public places had a special duty with regard to children.⁷ As reasonable men, and also in the state of their knowledge, the defenders should have anticipated the presence of children and the attractiveness of the object and taken steps to guard against such an accident as occurred.⁸ Counsel also referred to the following cases, in which this special duty towards children had been considered:—*Innes v. At advising on 15th July 1913,—

LORD KINNEAR.—This is an action of damages at the instance of a miner living at Lochgelly against the Provost, Magistrates, and Councillors of the burgh of Lochgelly for damages for the death of his infant child, which he alleges was due to the fault or negligence of the burgh authorities. The Sheriff-substitute has dismissed the action as irrelevant. The Sheriff-depute, on appeal, has recalled his substitute's interlocutor and allowed a proof. I am of opinion that the Sheriff-substitute was right and that no relevant case has been stated.

The case is that the defenders are in the habit of depositing town refuse upon a piece of waste ground where rubbish may be shot, which is described, in the language familiar to us all, as a "free coup." They are allowed by the proprietors to make use of this coup for depositing the rubbish, and they deposit their rubbish accordingly. They are not themselves proprietors of the ground, and they have no more right or control over it than any other person who is allowed by the owner to make certain uses of it. But then it is alleged that the free coup forms part of a grass field which is accessible to the public and which is treated as a public park. The expression is extremely vague, and I am not at all sure that it is intended to convey the ideas which would naturally occur to ordinary people as expressed by the term "public park." But I think what it does come to is this, that people are allowed to pass and repass over it, both adults and children, and children to play upon it, just as if it were public ground—that is to say, it is private ground to which the public is allowed to have access.

Now it is said that this field, although originally fenced, is so no longer; that there is a fence of stobs and wires which extends from the pursuer's dwelling-house alongside the grass park, but which has been, for some years, in a very bad state of repair, and is so much broken down that it is possible to walk between most pairs of the paling stobs without difficulty and without being impeded by the wire of the fence; it is said there is another access, because there had been originally a large wooden gate which had been broken down and is lying flat upon the ground; it is also said that there are many other breaks in the fence between the gate and the dwelling-house occupied by the pursuer. The practical result of the whole averments upon this matter is that the field, of which this free coup forms a part, is easily accessible by anybody who wants to go into it, whether adult or child.

Then it is averred that, amongst the refuse which the defenders are in the habit of depositing, there is generally, or always, a large quantity of paper and rags and other inflammable materials, which are got from the various dust bins of the burgh of Lochgelly and brought to be shot upon the waste ground; that as a consequence of the deposit of this rubbish the pieces of paper become detached and are blown about the field and along the foot-^{July 15, 1913.} path, which is annoying to the people whose houses adjoin the footpath; ^{Johnstone v.} and that, in order to prevent the annoyance caused by this rubbish blowing ^{Magistrates} about, it has been the practice, permitted by the defenders, to collect the ^{of Lochgelly.} paper and other inflammable material together at one point in the coup and Lord Kinnear. to set fire to them.

Now such a fire was lighted here; and the pursuer goes on to aver that his daughter, a child about two years and nine months old, was playing in his dwelling-house with another child of the same age. The pursuer's wife sent the children along to the house of her mother, who resides at the end of a row of four houses, of which the pursuer's house forms one, and close to the opening to the south end of the grass park. The averment is that the children had often gone to the grandmother's house in similar circumstances, and that the mother saw no risk in letting them do so and did not watch to see that they went where they were sent to. Instead of going to the grandmother's house they went into the field, and shortly afterwards another child came running to the mother and said that the little child was burning. After the children started for their grandmother's house, all that the pursuer seems to know is this, that the child was found with her clothes on fire. Her playmate was too young to be able to give an intelligent account of what had happened. The obvious inference is that she had gone into the field, reached the fire, and somehow got burned. The poor child was so seriously injured that she did not recover but died of the burning, and the action is now brought against the Magistrates of the burgh for their alleged negligence in exposing her to that danger.

I think there are two very material points to be kept in view in considering that allegation; the first is that the ground upon which the defenders were allowed to shoot their rubbish did not belong to them, that they had therefore no power or control over it, and had no duty or right to fence it, but were simply in the position of being allowed, like others, to make use of it for a particular purpose. The second material point is that it is not averred that they themselves set fire to the deposit of rubbish which is said to have been in flames when the child was burned, or that they had ever directed it to be burned, or that it was in fact burned by anybody for whom they are responsible. I think it necessary that this should be distinctly noted, because it is evident from the course of proceedings that the pursuer is not merely in the position of omitting to make a relevant averment connecting the defenders with the lighting of the fire, if such an averment would have been true, but that he deliberately abstained from making any point—if any point could be made—of such a fact as that the defenders themselves had set fire to the refuse and left a burning heap of rubbish upon the ground, without taking precautions for extinguishing it, because when the case came into this Court your Lordships were asked to allow an amendment of record which would have embodied an averment that the heap of rubbish was lighted by the defenders' servants or persons in their employment, and that the lighting was expressly permitted by them, or that it was done by their servants. But after some discussion, and before the case was heard upon the merits, the pursuer withdrew that amendment; and we are therefore obliged to read the record as it stands,

July 15, 1913. with the averment that the rubbish was lighted by somebody, but with no
Johnstone v. averment that it was lighted by the defenders or by anybody for whom Magistrates they are responsible. I take it therefore, upon the pursuer's case as stated, of Lochgelly. that he must base the defenders' responsibility upon the fact that they had Lord Kinnear. put rubbish upon this piece of waste ground, and not that they were in any way responsible for its having been set on fire by somebody else.

But then it is said that, whether they lighted the rubbish themselves or not, the defenders knew that that was a thing that was likely to happen; they knew that, in ordinary practice, the inflammable parts of these rubbish heaps were set on fire to obviate a nuisance, and therefore must have known, when the rubbish was put on the field, that that was an incident likely to occur. The question therefore is whether, in these circumstances, there is any relevant averment of fault. The learned Sheriff sends the case to proof, because he says that he cannot determine that question at this stage and that it ought not to be decided without inquiry—that is to say, as I understand, without his having the exact facts conclusively proved before him. Now if the only question were that which ultimately arises upon a case of negligence—to wit, whether the persons accused of negligence have taken reasonable precautions or not—I should be very much disposed to agree with the Sheriff in thinking that that is always a case depending so much upon particular circumstances and not upon general doctrines of law that it is much safer to ascertain what the facts actually are beforehand than to decide upon law without proof. But then there is the preliminary question which, I think, the learned Sheriff has failed to consider. There is no responsibility for negligence—that is, for the neglect of some duty which the person charged with neglect owes to the person injured—until it has been first established that there is such a duty in law. The pursuer must aver facts out of which a duty of taking care arises; and I do not think it is at all sufficient to say, after setting out a history of an accident such as I have referred to in this case, that it was the duty of the defenders to take precautions to prevent injury to a child. It is necessary, further, to say what the precautions were which they were bound to take and which they failed to take; and therefore one looks to see whether there is any averment of a duty to take some precaution which the defenders are said to have omitted. I have not been able to find that there is any such averment relevant to be sent to trial.

The learned Sheriff founds upon the case of Loverly v. Walker.¹ But that belongs to a totally different category of law from that which we are considering. That was a case in which the question—as to which the House of Lords and the Court of Appeal in England differed—was concerning the liability of an owner of land, who permits the public, infant or grown-up, to pass and re-pass over the land, in the event of his exposing them to some unusual and unexpected danger. The actual case was that a person, who had habitually allowed his land to be used without objection as a right of way, was said to have put into a field through which the right of way passed a vicious horse which had, on previous occasions, attacked and bitten people, and which attacked the plaintiff in this case and bit him and stamped upon him and seriously injured him. What the House of Lords held was that, July 15, 1913. if a man allows people to enter his land, he owes them a duty not to expose them to injury, and, in particular, not to expose them to the attacks of a dangerous animal; and it is of no consequence that the person so exposed to injury is not expressly invited to go upon the land, provided the conduct of the owner is such as to show that he acquiesces in his land being so used by the public. That was the judgment in Lowery,¹ and the only point upon which the House of Lords was at variance with the Appeal Court was one with which we are not concerned, namely, whether the same duty was due to a trespasser as the House of Lords held was due to a person lawfully upon the ground with the permission of the owner. That is a matter with which we have no concern, and although there are some indications of opinion that even a trespasser is not to be purposely injured by the owner of land on whose ground he trespasses, there is no judgment of the House upon it and no opinion that can, in any way, affect the present question. But the point of distinction that seems to me to be conclusive is this, that the defenders here are not the persons by whose leave and licence the poor child who was injured got upon that ground. They had nothing to do with it. They had no more right to give leave to or to permit this child or other people to enter upon and pass over the ground than had these other people to give them a right to tip their rubbish upon it. They were all alike licencees of the owners. Therefore the defenders had no duty to take precautions which an owner of land, in such circumstances, is supposed to be bound to take, because they could not protect the ground against the invasion of the public, children or grown-up; they could not fence it, because it was not theirs.

Turning then to the particular precautions which it is said they were bound to take, it appears to me that what is set out in the eighth article of the condescendence—set out in great detail—is altogether irrelevant in so far as it refers to the supposed duty of the defenders or their servants to fence the ground. It is said that they knew that there was a fence and that it was in a ruinous condition. If it was, that was no fault of theirs, and they were neither bound nor entitled to repair it. Then it is said that the children of the occupiers of the houses in Station Road—the road in which the pursuer was living—were, at the time of the accident and for some years before it, in the habit of going to the coup in search of playthings. The duty alleged to take precaution to prevent their going there is the same duty to take precaution referred to in the previous part of the condescendence—that they should have fenced it and prevented anyone entering the field at all. The defenders have no duty and no right to do that. Therefore, it appears to me that all the cases of the class of which I think *Lowery*¹ is the latest instance and one of the most important are beside the present question. There is no question here of the liability of owners of ground to persons whom they allow to make use of it.

But then there is a totally different ground of liability alleged, and that, I think, requires most serious consideration, because there can be no question that no one, whether he is the owner of ground or not, is entitled to

July 15, 1913. put upon a piece of ground, open to the public and habitually frequented by the public, any dangerous machine or dangerous animal without taking precautions against anyone getting hurt. There are many cases in our own books—and they are entirely in accordance with the English cases—of which Lord Kinnear. the case of *Campbell v. Ord & Maddison*¹ is a very good example. In that case it was held that persons, having put into a market-place an oilcake-crushing machine which would be dangerous if it were meddled with, and which they knew was very likely to be meddled with by children if they left it in the condition in which they did leave it and without anybody to look after it, were responsible for injury and damage done to children by a careless child having set it in motion. But then I think that that liability rests solely upon the ground that no person is entitled to put a thing in itself dangerous in the way of the public entitled to use the place where it is left. It makes no difference, to my mind, whether the public includes adults only, or adults and children, provided a thing is left there in such a position as to be dangerous to anybody. But I think the answer in this case is that the materials which the defendants left upon this waste ground or free coup are not in themselves dangerous to anybody. There is nothing dangerous in a collection of rubbish which is left in one corner of a field expressly devoted to the purpose of shooting rubbish by the persons to whom the field belongs. The danger arises only on the intervention of somebody else who has set the rubbish on fire.

I think the case which comes nearest to the question here, and which is a very valuable case, because of the extremely elaborate elucidation of the law of liability which is to be found in the judgment of the learned Judges of the Appeal Court, is Latham v. Johnson.² The only point of distinction between that case and the present is that the defendants were themselves owners of unfenced waste land and not, as in the present case, only persons permitted to use it. The unfenced land was accessible by a path leading from the house in which a child, between two and three years old, lived with its parents. The public were allowed by the defendants to traverse the land, and children of all ages were in the habit of playing in the heaps of sand and stone and other materials which were, from time to time, deposited there by the defendants. The injured child went upon the land unaccompanied by any older person and was shortly after found upon a heap of paving stones, one of which had fallen and injured her hand. The child was much too young to give any intelligible account of what had happened, and there was no evidence to show what had happened. But in an action for negligence, the jury found that the children played upon the land with the knowledge and permission of the defendants, that there was no invitation to the child to use the land unaccompanied, that the defendants ought to have known that there was a likelihood of children being injured by the stones, and that the defendants did not take reasonable care to prevent children being injured thereby. Now these being the facts, the Court held that there was no liability upon the defendants, because there was neither allurement, nor trap, nor invitation, nor dangerous object placed upon the land. And, upon the last point, which I think makes the case valuable for the present, the learned Judges point out that stones of themselves are not dangerous July 15, 1913. things, it is because they are meddled with that they become dangerous, and that, having deposited them upon the ground, the defendants were not responsible for anything that might be done by children and others meddling with them. They distinguish the case from that which is so obviously different of depositing things in themselves dangerous—as, for example, lime—in a place which children are in the habit of frequenting. But the ground of judgment is expressed most clearly in the opinion of Lord Justice Hamilton, who asks what kind of chattel it is in respect of which it is thought its owner owes a duty of care towards strangers, equally whether it is in a public place or in his own premises, and equally whether the strangers are invited or are licencees. “There is only one answer: the chattel must be something highly dangerous in itself, inherently or from the state in which the owner suffers it to be.”

If that be sound law, I presume there would be no question that, if this action had been brought for injury to an adult person, it must have been held to be completely irrelevant. Does it make any difference that the injury was done to a child too young to take care of itself? I am not prepared to assent entirely to what is said by the learned Sheriff-substitute, that it is impossible to differentiate between liability to children and liability to adults, unless that means only that the fundamental basis of legal liability must be the same in both cases. You must either show against the person you propose to make liable some positive wrongful act—such as putting a dangerous thing into a public place—or you must show a neglect of some duty arising from a relation between him and the person injured; and so far the grounds in law are probably very much the same, whether the person injured is a child or an adult. But if a duty of care is once established, there may be a very material difference in the degree of care which is required for its due performance. Innumerable cases go to show that, if one is bound to take reasonable precautions for the safety of someone exposed to danger, it is very material to consider whether the person injured is capable of helping himself, because the duty is relative. The person charged with it is entitled to expect that the other will take reasonable care for his own safety; and if he knows that those who are exposed to danger are helpless either from infancy or infirmity, he is bound to a proportionate degree of watchfulness. Accordingly, in many of the cases which have happened arising out of liability for accidents to children, that has been found to be a material element. Again, there is a series of cases which show that there is a great distinction between the liability which arises against landowners for exposing people to what has been described as a trap in the case of children and in the case of grown-up people, because what is a trap to a child may be no trap at all to any reasonable adult. And therefore I am not prepared to say that it makes no difference in this case that the person injured was a child of two years old.

Still, I think, it comes back to the original question, as decided in the case of Latham,¹ whether the child's injury was caused by its being exposed to something which was in itself dangerous or not, and I think there is no averment that it was. What the pursuer complains of seems to me to be

July 15, 1913. an indirect consequence of the normal use of the ground which the defenders were quite entitled to make and which everybody knew they made. There was no trap, because the mother knew perfectly how the ground was occupied, and there was no danger necessarily connected with anything the defenders themselves did. The injured child was put in danger because the mother believed that children of very tender age, who were told to go from one house to another, might be trusted not to stray. If it was incumbent on anyone to be watchful so as to prevent their straying, I see no ground for holding that that duty was imposed on the defenders.

Johnstone v.
Magistrates
of Lochgelly.

Lord Kinnear.

On the whole matter, therefore, I am of opinion that the Sheriff's judgment should be recalled, and that of the Sheriff-substitute restored.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I entirely agree with your Lordship. The averments here appear to me to be what I should term rather of an indeterminate than of an irrelevant character. They are averments every one of which, although intended to infer liability upon the part of the defenders, is capable of resulting in their freedom from liability because of the indeterminateness with which it is stated.

I look then to the pleas to which these averments relate. The first is that "the defenders, the Provost, Magistrates, and Councillors of the burgh of Lochgelly, having been the authors and users of said coup or refuse depot, there was a duty upon them in the circumstances condescended on to take precautions to prevent danger to children and others frequenting said coup or refuse depot, which they negligently failed to take, and the death of the pursuer's child having resulted from such failure, all as condescended on, they are liable to the pursuer in damages." It makes clear what I mean by indefiniteness of statement when I point to the statement—whatever is meant by it—"the defenders, the Provost, Magistrates, and Councillors . . . having been the authors and users of said coup." The Provost and Magistrates were not the only users of the coup, and therefore there is nothing to make it impossible that the responsibility for all that has happened—if fault there was—was not the fault of the Provost and Magistrates. The other plea upon which alone the pursuer founds his claim is that "the accident whereby the pursuer's child lost her life, being a direct result of the fault or negligence of the defenders, or those for whom they are responsible, decree should be granted as craved, with expenses." That only differs from the previous plea by greater conciseness and by the introduction of the word "direct." But then when one goes to the condescendence one does not find any meaning or justification which can be applied to the word "direct" in explanation of the alteration of the terms of the plea.

In these circumstances I would only add further that when the case came into the Sheriff Court there was a judgment of the Sheriff-substitute finding the case irrelevant. The case was then appealed to the Sheriff, and at that stage a motion for amendment of the record was made and allowed. An amendment was made, leaving, however, the main plea identical, as far as I can see, with the plea as originally stated. That amendment was No. 12 of process. Then, there was another amendment proposed, under the minute No. 15 of process,—but apparently it was not dealt with by the Sheriff, I think it must have been lodged after the Sheriff had given his judgment.

When the case came here counsel for the pursuer were asked whether they July 15, 1913.
 desired that amendment to be made, and, as I understood, they, after consideration, declined to proceed with it. I do not assume for one moment ^{Johnstone v.}
 that the declinature was made because counsel for the pursuer anticipated ^{Magistrates} that the crave would not be granted without an award of expenses, but ^{of Lochgelly.}
 from a proper consideration, which is always present to counsel in this Court, that the amendment should not be made unless there were grounds of fact, capable of being proved, which would support it. In these circumstances I should be very averse to encouraging litigation of this sort where it is made evident on the face of the process that the pursuer is merely endeavouring to build up a case for which he has really no justification in facts which can be laid before the Court. For these reasons I entirely agree with your Lordship. ^{Ld. Johnston.}

LORD MACKENZIE.—The question in this case is whether, assuming the facts averred by the pursuer to be proved, there would then be evidence of negligence on the part of the defenders fit to be submitted to a jury. It is said that the pursuer's child was burnt owing to the negligence of the defenders in allowing a rubbish heap, in which the refuse of the burgh of Lochgelly is deposited, to remain unfenced and unprotected, and in causing or permitting waste paper to be burnt there. The pursuer admits on record that the defenders have no right or interest in the park where the "free coup" is other than a permission by personal agreement with the tenant and proprietor to deposit rubbish in a certain part of it. The pursuer's aver-ment is that his daughter, aged two years and nine months, was sent by her mother from his house, which is close to an entry leading into the park, to her grandmother's house, and that she found her way to the coup and was burnt to death. The averment is that the entry is in fact habitually used by the public as an access to the park, which is treated as a public park.
 It is nowhere averred on record that the defenders or their servants lit the fire which caused the injuries. An amendment was proposed embodying a statement to this effect but was withdrawn. The only case made against the defenders is that they were in the habit of bringing waste paper to a place in a field frequented by the public, where they knew that children played; that what was brought was attractive to children; that it had to be burned; and that the defenders instructed their servants to burn the waste paper, and made no objection to others doing so. The pursuer says the defenders knew, or ought to have known, that the rag-pickers who frequented the coup had been in the habit of burning paper and other material on the coup. In these circumstances the pursuer avers there was a duty on the defenders, so long as the coup was not fenced or protected, to have taken precautions to ensure that any fires kindled should be properly watched, and that owing to the defenders' failure to discharge this duty they are responsible for the accident.

We were referred to several cases, among others to the two in respect of which the Sheriff allowed a proof before answer. None of them, however,

July 15, 1913. Johnstone v. Magistrates of Lochgelly.
Lord Mac-kenzie. held to exist because a vicious horse was put into a field, and injury was done to the plaintiff, who was not a trespasser; or the case of Cooke,¹ where a turntable was left unlocked, a machine of which it might be said that the danger from it assailed the children whenever they saw it. The present case is quite different. There is nothing per se dangerous about putting down waste paper. The danger, on the pursuer's averments, was, or may have been, caused solely by the act of a third party, for whom the defenders were not responsible. There could be no duty on their part to have a watchman constantly on duty to see that all and sundry did not light the paper, or to see that, if they did, the fires were extinguished. Nor was there any duty on the defenders' carter, who, it is said, was aware that the fire was burning, if it had been lit by someone else not connected with the defenders.

This is taking the case on the footing which the pursuer has averred on record that the paper that went on fire was put on the heap by the defenders. This is to my mind by no means clear on the pursuer's averments. Refuse is deposited on the heap by persons other than the defenders. In cond. 6 the reason is explained why children were specially attracted to the coup. There is no statement in that article that the objects said to have attracted the children were put on the heap by the defenders.

I am of opinion that the pursuer has stated no relevant case.

THE COURT recalled the second interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute dated 6th May 1913 and the interlocutor of the Sheriff dated 25th January 1913, reverted to the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute dated 8th November 1912, and of new dismissed the action.

THE NORTH BRITISH RAILWAY COMPANY, First Parties.—

GEORGE WINGATE, Second Party.—Cooper, K.C.—Gentles.

North British Railway Co. v. Wingate.

Statute—Repeal—Effect of Public Act on rights created by previous Private Act—Railway—Dividend—Half-yearly or yearly calculation—North British Railway Act, 1888 (51 and 52 Vict. cap. clxiii.), sec. 47—Railway Companies (Accounts and Returns) Act, 1911 (1 and 2 Geo. V. cap. 34), sec. 4 (1).

The North British Railway Company, in exercise of powers conferred by a private Act of 1888, created certain preferred and deferred ordinary stocks, the terms of the Act providing that a non-cumulative dividend of 3 per cent should be payable out of the available profits of each half year to the preferred stockholders, and that the balance of such profits should go to the deferred stockholders.

By the Railway Companies (Accounts and Returns) Act, 1911, every railway company was relieved of any obligation to prepare or submit to their shareholders or auditors accounts or balance-sheets oftener than once a year.

Held that the later Act did not relieve the railway company of the duty of calculating the dividends due to the preferred and deferred stockholders on the basis of the profits of each half year.

ON 20th May 1913 a special case was presented for the opinion and judgment of the Court with reference to the rights of holders of preferred ordinary stock and deferred ordinary stock of the North British Railway Company. July 15, 1913.
North British
Railway Co.
v. Wingate.

The North British Railway Company were the first parties to the case, and George Wingate, a holder of deferred ordinary stock of the Company, was the second party. 1ST DIVISION.

The case set forth that prior to 1888 there were two ordinary stocks of the Company, North British Ordinary Stock and Edinburgh and Glasgow Ordinary Stock, and that in that year the North British Railway Act, 1888 (51 and 52 Vict. cap. clxiii.), received the royal assent, which provided, inter alia, as follows:—Sec. 47. "The directors may prepare a scheme for the consolidation division or conversion of North British Ordinary Stock and Edinburgh and Glasgow Ordinary Stock in the capital of the Company into one or more class or classes of new shares or stock hereinafter called 'new stock' of such name or names and amount or amounts respectively and bearing respectively such rate of dividend and having attached thereto respectively such preferences and priorities and other rights as shall be defined in such scheme Provided that the rate of dividend on the preferred portion of such new stock shall not exceed three per cent per annum and the Edinburgh and Glasgow Ordinary Stock shall be consolidated with and rank pari passu with the deferred portion thereof: Any preference share or preference stock which may be issued in pursuance of such scheme shall be entitled to the preferential dividend or interest assigned thereto out of the profits of each half year in priority only to the ordinary stock of the Company but if in any half year there are not profits available for the payment of the full amount of preferential dividend or interest for that half year no part of the deficiency shall be made good out of the profits of any subsequent half year or out of any other funds of the Company. For the purposes of this section the half year shall terminate on the thirty-first day of July and on the thirty-first day of January in each year."

In accordance with the Act of 1888 the directors of the first parties prepared a scheme which was duly approved by the shareholders, whereby the North British Ordinary Stock was divided into two parts, each of equal nominal amount with the stock so divided. To the first part called "North British Ordinary Preference Stock" a maximum dividend of £3 per centum per annum, payable out of the profit of each separate half year, was assigned. With the second part of such stock the nominal amount of the Edinburgh and Glasgow Ordinary Stock was consolidated under the name "North British Ordinary Stock," and there was assigned to the stock so consolidated the whole of the profit of each half year remaining after payment of the dividend provided for the North British Ordinary Preference Stock. The names of these stocks were subsequently changed to "Preferred Ordinary" and "Deferred Ordinary" respectively.

The case then referred to the terms of the Railway Companies (Accounts and Returns) Act, 1911, which provided for the preparation of annual accounts and returns by railway companies, and relieved them (except as therein provided) of any obligation to prepare or submit to their shareholders or auditors accounts or balance-sheets oftener than once a year. The material sections of that Act are quoted

July 15, 1913. infra.* The case further set forth that the accounts of the first parties were in use to close half yearly on 31st January and 31st July in common with the accounts of all the Scottish Railway Companies; but that, in virtue of the Act of 1911, these would now close yearly, except as therein provided, on 31st December.

North British
Railway Co.
v. Wingate.

The contentions of the parties were stated as follows:—"The first parties maintain that in virtue of the provisions of the Act of 1911, and notwithstanding the terms of section 47 of the Act of 1888, and the scheme which followed thereon, they are not bound to ascertain and calculate dividend on the preferred ordinary stock out of the profits of each half year, but are entitled to ascertain, calculate, and pay such dividend out of the profits of each whole year, in priority to any dividend on the deferred ordinary stock for each whole year.

"The second party maintains that the Act of 1911 does not prejudice or affect the rights or interests of the deferred ordinary shareholders under the provisions of section 47 of the Act of 1888 and the scheme which followed thereon, and that the first parties are only entitled to pay the preferential dividend on the preferred ordinary stock out of the profits of each separate half year, and also that if, in any half year, there are not profits available for the payment of the full amount of the preferential dividend for that half year on the preferred ordinary stock, no part of the deficiency shall be made good

* The Railway Companies (Accounts and Returns) Act, 1911 (1 and 2 Geo. V. cap. 34), enacts:—

Sec. 1. (1) "Every railway company shall annually prepare accounts and returns in accordance with the form set out in the First Schedule to this Act, and shall submit their accounts to their auditors in that form."

(2) "The accounts and returns . . . shall be made up for the year ending the thirty-first day of December, or such other day as the Board of Trade may fix in the case of any company or class of companies to meet the special circumstances of that company or class of companies."

Sec. 4. (1) "A railway company shall not be under any obligation to prepare or to submit to their shareholders or auditors, statements of accounts or balance-sheets, or to hold ordinary general meetings more than once a year, and anything which under any special Act is authorised or required to be done at a general meeting of a railway company to be held at any specified time may be done at the annual general meeting of the company at whatever time held:

"Provided that nothing in this provision shall relieve a railway company of any obligation to prepare half-yearly accounts in cases where those accounts are required in connection with any guarantee of dividend under any such statutory provisions.

(2) "The directors of an incorporated railway company may, if it appears to them that the profits of the company are sufficient, declare and pay an interim dividend for the first half of any year, notwithstanding that the accounts are not audited for the half year, and that a statement of accounts and balance-sheet for the half year is not submitted to the shareholders, and may close their register and books of transfer before the date on which the interim dividend is declared in the same manner and for the same time and subject to the same provisions as they may close their register or books before the date on which their ordinary dividend is declared or before the date of their ordinary meeting.

out of the profits of the next or of any subsequent half year or out of July 15, 1913. any other funds of the first parties."

The questions of law were:—“(1) Are the first parties entitled to pay dividend on their preferred ordinary stock out of the profits of the whole year commencing 1st January 1913 and of each succeeding whole year? (2) Are the holders of the deferred ordinary stock of the first parties entitled to insist that the dividend upon the preferred ordinary stock shall be paid only out of the profits of each separate half year, and that, if in any half year there are not profits available for the payment in full of the preferential dividend for that half year, no part of the deficiency shall be made good out of the profits of the next or any subsequent half year or out of any other funds of the first parties? (3) In the event of the first question being answered in the affirmative and the second question in the negative, are the first parties entitled, should they for the first half of any year declare and pay an interim dividend on the preferred ordinary stock of less than three per cent per annum, to declare for the whole of such year a dividend on the preferred ordinary stock of three per cent and pay the same less the amount paid as interim dividend?”

North British
Railway Co.
v. Wingate.

The case was heard before the First Division (without Lord Macenzie) on 8th and 9th July 1913.

Argued for the first parties;—Although the Railway Company would willingly continue to make up its accounts in the accustomed half-yearly simple form, that was no longer permissible. The Act of 1911 had imposed on railway companies the duty of preparing much more elaborate accounts than formerly, but in compensation it had relieved them from the duty of doing so oftener than once a year.¹ That benefit would be inoperative if they were still required to calculate and declare dividends half yearly, because the making up of accounts and the declaration and payment of dividends were interdependent. The declaration of a dividend could only be authorised by a general meeting, which again must have before it the certificate of the auditor, and that could only follow on the preparation and audit of accounts.² Nothing in the Act of 1911—although it had substituted yearly for half-yearly accounts—had done away with the necessity for these preliminaries. If then dividends were still required to be declared half yearly, the whole provisions of section 4 (1) would be rendered inept. The purpose of the Act of 1911 clearly was to bring into operation a uniform system of annual accounts for all the railway companies in the country, and a general Act with such a clearly expressed purpose as that must be held to derogate from all rights created by private Acts that were inconsistent with it, and to involve reading “yearly” for “half-yearly” in all statutory provisions relating to accounts.³ The terms, too, of section 4 (3) expressly confirmed that view, and it had been provided for by anticipation in section 64 of the North British Railway Act, 1888.³ Further, that the Act of 1911 was not confined

The proviso in subsection (1) expressly protected guaranteed dividends from any change, and thus implied that other dividends were affected with change, and subsection (2) and the relative Schedule¹ provided for the payment of a half-yearly interim dividend in circumstances and in terms which implied that the calculation of ordinary dividends was to proceed on an annual accounting only. Moreover, the exception contained in the proviso to section 4 (1) did not help the second party. There was no guarantee here in the sense of that section. The purpose of that section was to guard against any alteration of existing cautionary obligations, and to safeguard rights constituted by a statutory guarantee such as that of the North British Railway Company in favour of the Newburgh and North Fife Railway Company.² Nor could the second party found on the contractual aspect of his relationship with the first parties. The alteration in the law had rendered the conditions of the contract no longer binding.³

Argued for the second party;—The rights of deferred shareholders under their contract with the first parties, entered into in pursuance of the North British Railway Act, 1888, were not affected by the general Act of 1911, because that Act did not affect such matters of domestic concern as the ascertainment and apportionment of half-yearly profits. The Act dealt only with a question of accounting, with the accounts required for statistical purposes, and, in respect of the increased burden imposed upon railway companies in connection with the preparation of these accounts, they were relieved from the necessity for preparing them twice a year. All the same, the statutory provisions relating to the keeping of accounts and books,⁴ had not been repealed, and thus the rights of deferred shareholders were preserved independently of the proviso contained in subsection (1) of section 4 of the Act. All that the second party desired was that the dividends should be calculated on the basis of the half-yearly profits—independently of the time when the dividends were declared and paid—and for the mere purpose of calculation it was quite unnecessary to go through the elaborate process referred to by the first parties; the ordinary books of the Company would show all that was necessary. That the possibility of such calculation was contemplated by the Act of 1911 was clear from the provisions of subsection (2) of section 4 as to interim dividends. Moreover, a general Act dealing, not with dividends, but with the preparation of public accounts, could not by implication alter contractual obligations entered into in pursuance of a private Act.⁵ In any event the proviso contained in subsection (1) of section 4 of the Act operated to protect the deferred shareholders in the enjoyment of the rights conferred upon them, after due payment had been made to the preferred shareholders.¹ The word July 15, 1918. "guarantee" in that proviso was not used in its strict legal sense of a cautionary obligation. It was used in its ordinary significance of an obligation to pay. Further, it was an unjustifiable straining of language to maintain that the extinction of the rights of deferred shareholders, which the proposals of the first parties involved, was a "modification" in the sense of subsection (3) of section 4 of the Act.

At advising on 15th July 1913,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a special case brought by the North British Railway Company and by a gentleman who is a holder of deferred stock, and it asks for what are practically directions as to the rights of parties in connection with the declaration of dividend on this stock when the appropriate time arrives. The stock in question was issued under statutory powers which were given by the North British Railway Act of 1888. That Act, by the 47th section, authorised the directors of the North British Railway to "prepare a scheme for the consolidation division or conversion" of certain existing stocks, which were known by the name of North British Ordinary Stock and the Edinburgh and Glasgow Ordinary Stock. These were to be consolidated, divided, or converted "into one or more classes of new shares or stock hereinafter called 'new stock' of such name or names and amount or amounts respectively . . . and having attached thereto respectively such preferences and priorities and other rights as shall be defined in such scheme"; and then comes the proviso, "that the rate of dividend on the preferred portion of such new stock shall not exceed three per cent per annum and the Edinburgh and Glasgow Ordinary Stock shall be consolidated with and rank pari passu with the deferred portion thereof." And then comes this other statutory provision, "Any preference share or preference stock which may be issued in pursuance of such scheme shall be entitled to the preferential dividend or interest assigned thereto out of the profits of each half year in priority only to the ordinary stock of the Company but if in any half year there are not profits available for the payment of the full amount of preferential dividend or interest for that half year no part of the deficiency shall be made good out of the profits of any subsequent half year or out of any other funds of the Company"; and then there is a provision as to when the half year should commence and terminate.

The effect of that section of the Act which I have read is not doubtful; it gives power to the North British Railway Company, if they choose, to prepare a scheme (which has to be approved in a certain way); it gives them power to do what they otherwise could not possibly have done, namely, to alter certain stocks which existed, and, concurrently therewith, to alter the rights of the parties who hold those stocks, and it prescribes certain conditions which must be observed in exercising this power. Acting upon those powers the directors of the Company prepared a scheme, and at an extraordinary general meeting in August 1888 this scheme was approved.

July 15, 1913. I need not read the whole scheme. It divided the North British Ordinary Stock into two parts, each of equal nominal amount with the stock so divided. It provided that three per cent, being the maximum figure allowed by the Act of Parliament, should be the dividend of the new preference stock payable out of the profits of each separate half year, and it provided that there should be assigned to the ordinary stock the whole profit of each half year remaining after the payment of dividend provided for the preference stock. At the time when the scheme was passed the general Acts, which applied to the Railway Company, provided that railway companies should make up their accounts half-yearly, and, accordingly, this provision for striking the dividend at each half year was entirely in accordance with what might be called the general law of the land as regards railway companies.

North British
Railway Co.
v. Wingate.

Ld. President.

Now, in 1911 a new General Act was passed, which entirely altered the duties and obligations of railway companies as to their accounts. It prescribed a very much more elaborate form for the accounts of railway companies than the form which obtained under the existing legislation, and by section 4 it provided as follows: "A railway company shall not be under any obligation to prepare or to submit to their shareholders or auditors, statements of accounts or balance-sheets, or to hold ordinary general meetings more than once a year, and anything which under any special Act is authorised or required to be done at a general meeting of a railway company to be held at any specified time may be done at the annual general meeting of the company at whatever time held." That is the leading provision of section 4. There are certain concomitant provisions which I shall presently notice, but it is upon that leading provision that this question has arisen, namely, Are matters to go on as they did before, a dividend being declared or at least calculated half-yearly, or does this general legislation so alter matters that a dividend is now to be declared only once a year and calculations made upon that basis?

That this raises a very practical question in which private persons' pecuniary rights are involved is quite obvious. It is probably best brought home by taking a very simple illustration. Let me suppose—the figures are entirely fanciful—that there were £10,000 preference and £10,000 ordinary stock. Let me suppose that in one particular year the railway company made £500 of divisible profits. Now, if that £500 was earned in two equal portions, namely, £250 in the first six months and £250 in the second six months, it would make no difference at all whether you calculated the dividend according to the half year or whether you calculated the dividend according to the whole year. If you calculated it according to the whole year £500 permits of payment of £300 to the preference shareholders, which is 3 per cent upon their holding, the capital being, as I say, £10,000, and £200 to the deferred shareholders, which is 2 per cent upon their holding. Precisely the same thing happens if you calculate half year by half year; £250 is made in the half year, of which £150 goes to the preference shareholders, the balance of £100 going to the deferred shareholders. The same thing happens in the second half year, and at the end of it the preference shareholders will have received two sums of £150, to wit £300, and the deferred shareholders will have received two sums of £100, to wit £200. But let me suppose that, instead of the July 15, 1913. profits for division being made up of two moieties of £250 each, £100 of North British profit is made in the first six months and £400 in the second six months. Railway Co. In that case the result would be completely different. Calculated by the v. Wingate. full year the result is as before—the preferred shareholders get £300 and Ld. President. the deferred get £200; but calculated by the six months what happens is this—in the first six months there is £100 of profit that goes entirely to the preferred shareholders (whose full limit would be £150), and the deferred shareholders get nothing. When you come, on the other hand, to the second six months, there is £400 of divisible profit. Out of that the preferred shareholders get their full share of £150, making in all £250 for the year. The deferred shareholders get what remains, namely, £250, making in all £250. In other words the result now is, that instead of the preferred shareholders having had for the full year 3 per cent, and the deferred shareholders 2 per cent, the preferred shareholders get $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent and the deferred shareholders $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. I have put that simple instance because it brings the question in a concrete form very clearly before our eyes. But it is not a mere imaginary case, because figures were quoted to us (I do not use them, as they were not made part of the special case), but figures were quoted to us which show that in the past history of these very stocks very large pecuniary differences would have arisen if the dividends had been calculated the one way instead of the other.

The deferred shareholder, who is a party to the special case, naturally wishes that the calculation should be upon the old lines, because it is quite evident that, put as a universal proposition, if a preference dividend is not a cumulative preference dividend, it is always in the interest of the person who holds the deferred shares that the periods or rests should be as frequent as possible, and therefore it is clearly for the interest of the deferred shareholder to say "I am entitled to have my dividend calculated each half year separately as in the past, because upon the other system I could not gain and I might possibly lose."

Now, the case has been very carefully argued before us. The general view with which I think your Lordships would approach the case would be this, that you would not expect that an Act of the class of the Act of 1911—which is obviously dealing with what I might call the duties of railway companies to the public (no doubt including their shareholders in the public), in publishing their accounts—you would not expect that such an Act would alter the contractual relations between a railway company and some of its shareholders. That the relations of the deferred shareholders and the railway company are contractual cannot admit of any doubt. Those shares were issued in virtue of the scheme, which had a statutory effect, and the deferred shareholder who bought his shares was entitled to say to himself, "These are my rights, and these will be continued to me." It is clear that it would be in the power of Parliament to alter those rights, but if it is necessary to make something that is clear more clear, certainly the 64th section of the Act of 1888 which allowed these shares to be created makes it amply clear. That section provides—"Nothing in this Act contained shall exempt the company and the railway by this Act authorised to be made from the provisions of any general Act

July 15, 1913. relating to railways or the better and more impartial audit of the accounts of railway companies now in force or which may hereafter pass." None the less I think the general view with which the Court is bound to approach an Act of this sort is that, unless it is absolutely necessary, private rights shall

North British Railway Co. v. Wingate.
Ld. President. not be held to have been altered, and I do not think that this view is in any way weakened by a consideration of those provisions of section 4 of the Act of 1911 to which I said I should make a further allusion. The first of these is in subsection (1) "Provided that nothing in this provision shall relieve a railway company of any obligation to prepare half-yearly accounts in cases where those accounts are required in connection with any guarantee of dividend under any such statutory provisions." The word "such" there is obviously a drafting mistake, probably having crept in through a rearrangement of sections, and I think in any case it may be omitted for the sake of clearness. That proviso seems to me to show that the statute did not intend to alter private rights. Whether it applies to this particular case is another question which I shall presently discuss.

Now, that being the general view with which I approach the Act, I confess if there was nothing more to be said one would say at once that this is merely an Act for arranging the way in which accounts are to be stated. It has nothing to do with the principles upon which dividends are to be calculated. The terms of the contract on which dividends are to be calculated, to wit, the words of the section upon which the scheme proceeds, do not in any way associate the dividend with a particular statement of accounts. The dividend is to be taken out of the profits of each separate half year for the preferred shareholders. The deferred shareholders are to get the rest. But nothing is said about the particular statement of accounts for the public or anyone else.

If there was nothing more, that in itself would, I think, be conclusive. But we had a very ingenious argument from the first parties, the Railway Company. I may say in passing that of course in one sense the Railway Company have no interest in this matter. They are in a sense trustees. They are only anxious to pay the dividends to the persons who are entitled thereto, and therefore their only interest may be the very secondary one of having to avoid extra trouble in stating accounts. But for all that I do not think the case has been in any way prejudiced by allowing the Railway Company to take up for the moment a polemical attitude against the deferred shareholders, because they are just as able to argue the question as the preferred shareholders themselves, for whom in this case, so to speak, they have appeared, and I do not think that the deferred shareholders are in any way prejudiced by having argued it against the Company instead of against the preferred shareholders. Now the argument of the learned Dean was this—and it was a very forcible argument—he said if you look at the general body of railway statutes you will find that declaring a dividend is not a thing that the directors can do off-hand, but it is fenced with many statutory provisions. I do not need to go through all of these. They begin with—and really so far as that goes end with—the provisions which are to be found in the Companies Clauses Act of 1845. But the gist of them is this, that before you can declare a dividend you must get the authority of a general meeting to declare it, and before you get the authority of a general meeting you must get the certificate of an auditor that you really have July 15, 1913.

 money out of which you can declare it, that is to say, that the dividend which you are proposing to declare can, in the state of the accounts of the North British Company, be properly declared out of profits made, and will not be declared v. Wingate.
 out of something that is truly capital or something that is for some reason Ld. President.
 not divisible as profit. All that is very true. Then comes the next step, which is that, inasmuch as the first subsection of section 4 entirely dispenses with the statutory duty to hold half-yearly meetings, and indeed prohibits railway companies from holding them, that puts an end to the possibility of a half-yearly account and a half-yearly declaration of dividend.

I confess when I first heard that argument I thought it a very formidable one; but upon further consideration I have come to the conclusion that it is not necessary that it should prevail and overbear what I have already mentioned as the general consideration with which one would approach this Act; and for this very good reason, that I see no difficulty in saying that for the future the declaration should be a yearly declaration, although the calculation of dividend which is then made should be based upon the profits which are de facto made in each half year. Nor do I see that that is inconsistent with publishing the accounts for the public in the yearly form required by the Act of 1911, because, as I have already pointed out, the calculation of the half-yearly profits, which is, so to speak, the charter of the deferred shareholder under the scheme and under the Act of 1888, is not in any way linked with the publication of an account; it depends on the actual fact of the profit having been made and being apparent from the books of the Company; and it is perfectly possible for the Company to show what that is and to satisfy the auditor that that profit was actually made without necessarily showing it to the auditor in that elaborate form which they are bound to use with regard to the general accounts of the Company at the end of the year in a question with the public. In other words, to go back to my illustration, and supposing that profit had been made to the amount of £100 in one half year, and to the amount of £400 in the other, I see no reason why at the end of that year a dividend should not be declared in this form, viz., 2½ per cent to the preference shareholders, being at the rate of 2 per cent for the first half year, and 3 per cent for the second half year (which is exactly what it would be because they get £100 for the first half year, and they get £150 for the second half year) and a dividend of 2½ per cent to the deferred shareholders, being the balance that is over after payment in each half year of the preferential dividend. That would seem to me a perfectly good declaration of dividend, and would be entirely in accordance with the contractual rights of parties.

If I am right there, that ends the matter. But there is another matter that I ought to refer to, because there was considerable argument upon it, and if this case goes farther it is as well that our views should be expressed upon it. I have already read the proviso that nothing in this provision should relieve the Railway Company of any obligation to prepare half-yearly accounts in cases where those accounts are required in connection with any guarantee of dividend under any statutory provisions. Now the deferred shareholder argued that, even if he was not right upon the lines that I have already indicated, he was still saved by that proviso; to which it was

July 15, 1913. answered that this is not a case of guarantee at all. If guarantee is read in the strict legal sense of the word, this clearly is not a case of guarantee, because guarantee in strict law always assumes three parties. There is the principal debtor and the creditor and the third person who guarantees to the creditor that portion of the debt which the principal debtor may not be able to pay. Now there is nothing of that sort here, because there is no interposition of a third party at all. On the other hand, in popular language it would not be very far wide of the mark to say that here there was a guarantee by the Railway Company to the deferred shareholder that he would get all that was over after paying a 3 per cent dividend, if possible, upon the half year's profit, the word "guarantee" there being used no longer in its strict sense but in the absolutely general sense of promise or acknowledgment. As I have already said, I do not think it is necessary to decide that question. If it were, I should be inclined to hold that "guarantee" was used in an inaccurate and popular sense rather than a legal sense, because I should always strive to come to the conclusion that this Act, which was passed for public purposes, was not meant to alter private rights, if I could find any interpretation of it which would be consistent with that general idea.

North British
Railway Co.
v. Wingate.

Ld. President.

There is this other little difficulty that the proviso speaks of the obligation to prepare half-yearly accounts. Now, as I have already pointed out, the strength of the argument against the deferred shareholder is not upon the preparation of the accounts, but is upon the question of having the general meeting and getting the sanction of the auditor to the dividend that is to be declared, and the proviso does not deal with any of these things, but only with the preparation of the accounts. The only way in which that might be got over is by section 4 (3) which was used in argument by both parties, viz., "Any statutory provisions affecting the railway company shall be read with the modifications necessary to bring them into conformity with this section." It may be that, if the Railway Company were told to prepare half-yearly accounts, that would practically modify subsection (1), which says that a general meeting need only be held once a year. I do not know, because in the view I have taken it is not necessary to go into these things. I only say, as I am dealing with the third subsection, that I do not think it will avail to upset a general rule to show that the modification that here is necessary to allow the statutory provisions to work is a modification which will destroy private rights. If my first argument is right, that is not so, because, as I have already shown, the statute will work perfectly well as it is. It does not matter that the state of affairs will be a little altered in this sense, that the eventual outcome of the deferred shareholders' rights will only be known at the end of the year instead of at the end of each half year. It was put to us that there might have been a change in the holder of the stock during the currency of the year. But there is nothing in that. The right to a dividend effeirs to the particular portion of stock. As to who holds that stock, whether it is A or B, that is of no importance to the Company declaring the dividend, and all those things, as one knows in practice, are settled by making Stock Exchange transactions either ex dividend or cum dividend.

Upon the whole matter, I have come to the conclusion that we should answer the second question that is put to us in the affirmative, and it is July 15, 1913. unnecessary to answer the first and third questions.

North British
Railway Co.
v. Wingate.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I also agree in the opinion which your Lordship has delivered. I was disposed at the hearing of the case to think that the proviso at the end of section 4 (1) of the Act of 1911 might be so interpreted as to make the present case an exception to the general application of the Act, on the footing that in the sense of that proviso the preferred shareholders might be held to have a guarantee of a preferable dividend from the deferred shareholders. I have come to be quite satisfied that that is not the case, and that that subsection and its proviso does not apply to their position.

Section 4 (2), on the other hand, is entirely applicable and, I think, clears the ground of all difficulty. If the directors, in the exercise of their discretion, choose to declare an interim dividend on the preferred shares on the first half year's working, they will do so as an interim dividend only. When accounts are made up at the end of the year, it will be necessary to include in the accounting such a balance at the end of the first half year as will determine what the preferred shareholders would have received, had the Act of 1911 not passed, under their contract rights. This will not prevent the Act having its full effect. There will be one proper balance of the Company's accounts, one audit, one meeting, and one declaration of a dividend. But there will be a subsidiary calculation required in order to ascertain whether the interim dividend of the first half year to the preferred shareholders has to be supplemented for that half year, or whether those shareholders require to be surcharged in crediting them their dividend for the second half year.

THE COURT answered the second question of law in the affirmative, and found it unnecessary to answer the other questions.

A workman was employed in a factory as underman at a mangle. His duties were to carry the cloth to and from the mangle and to assist the headman in putting it on to the rollers. It was no part of his duty to be inside the rail fencing the mangle or to interfere with the mangle while working. Cleaning machinery while in motion was prohibited, but on two days in each week the machinery was stopped in the early morning for cleaning, and it was the duty of the workman to assist the headman to clean the mangle at these times.

While the machinery was in motion, and in the absence of the headman, the workman, without orders, went inside the rail and attempted to clean a part of the mangle, and was injured.

Held that the accident did not arise out of and in the course of his employment.

M'Diarmid v.
Ogilvy Brothers.

1st DIVISION,
Sheriff of Forfarshire.

The case set forth :—

"The following facts were admitted or proved:—(1) That the respondent was in the employment of the appellants at a weekly wage of 19s. He entered their employment on 2nd December 1912. (2) That the respondent worked at a mangle as underman or beamer along with and under William Burnett as headman. (3) That the mangle at which they worked has three rollers. (4) That at a distance of four feet from the mangle there are rails. (5) That the middle roller, called the beamer-roller, moves on slides, and is moved out for the cloth to be passed over the rails and rolled on to it. (6) That while the process of mangling the cloth is going on there is no motion on the slides. (7) That after the cloth is on the beamer-roller it is moved back between the two other rollers. (8) That the cloth is then mangled by an alternate forward and reverse motion of the mangle. (9) That after it is mangled the cloth is rolled on to a fourth roller, called the stripper-roller, which is fixed above the mangle, and this is then unfixed and carried away to a rack with the cloth on it. (10) That part of the beamer's duties is to bring the cloth to the machine, to help to put it on the beamer-roller, to help to take it off on to the stripper-roller, and to carry the latter to the rack with the assistance of the headman. In addition he is under the general orders of the headman. (11) That it is no part of the beamer's duty to be inside the rails while the machine is working. (12) That it is no part of the beamer's duty to interfere with the machine while the cloth is in it. (13) That it was part of the respondent's duty to assist Burnett in cleaning the machinery of the mangle at certain fixed times, viz., Tuesday 4.30 to 5.30 A.M., and Friday 4.30 to 5.30 A.M., when the machinery was stopped for the purpose. (14) That there are also fixed times during the day-shift on Wednesdays and Saturdays, when the machinery is stopped for the purpose of having it cleaned. Respondent was engaged during the night. (15) That when engaged on 2nd December 1912 the respondent was told by the foreman, John Farquhar, who engaged him, on no account to clean anything while the machinery was in motion. The respondent had no previous experience of factory work. (16) That there was a notice opposite the mangle at which respondent worked in the following terms:—'Cleaning machinery in motion and cleaning or any other work (except by specially engaged sweepers) during meal hours strictly prohibited.' (17) That on 23rd January 1913, while Burnett was out of his sight on the other side of the mangle, the respondent, acting without any orders from Burnett, placed himself within the rails and attempted to clean the slide of the mangle with a piece of waste, whereupon the loose waste was caught by the roller and his right hand was drawn into the machine by the motion of the rollers. (18) That the respondent's right hand was severely injured by the accident, and after treatment, required to be amputated, as a result of the accident, and was amputated on 26th January 1913.

"On these facts as proved I found that the accident to the respondent was one arising out of and in the course of his employment with the appellants, and awarded compensation to the respondent July 16, 1913. accordingly."

The question of law for the opinion of the Court was:—"Whether ^{M'Diarmid v. Ogilvy Brothers.} I was right in holding that the respondent was injured by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment?"

The case was heard before the First Division on 10th and 11th June 1913.

Argued for the appellants;—The workman was not acting within the sphere of his employment when the accident occurred. At that time he had no duty to be within the rails or to attempt to clean the machine. He was arrogating to himself duties which he was neither engaged nor entitled to perform, and the risk he thereby exposed himself to was not a risk incidental to his employment.¹ The cases where mere disobedience to an order had been held not sufficient to take a workman out of the scope of his employment² had no bearing here. The appellants' case did not rest on mere disobedience. It rested on the fact that the workman had no general employment to clean the machine, his employment with regard to cleaning being confined to giving assistance to the headman at two specified hours in each week.

Argued for the respondent;—Part of the work for which the respondent was employed was to act as assistant cleaner. Therefore it could not be said that he was acting outwith the scope of his employment in cleaning the machine—even though he attempted to do so at an unauthorised time. It was absurd to contend that his employment could be split up so as to make him a cleaner at one time and not a cleaner at others. Nor could it be urged that he was excluded from compensation on the ground that he was doing work of a different kind from that for which he was employed,³ or that he was in any territory in which he was not entitled to be,⁴ or that he was engaged in doing anything for his own purposes.⁵ If he was within the scope of his employment, it was immaterial that he was carrying out the work in a forbidden way.⁶

LORD PRESIDENT.—The facts here are exceedingly clearly set forth by the learned Sheriff who acted as arbitrator. The respondent worked at a mangle as an underman or beamer. The duties of the underman or beamer are set forth, and are "to bring cloth to the machine, to help to put it on the beamer-roller, to help to take it off on to the stripper-roller, and to carry the latter to the rack with the assistance of the headman." And then the learned Sheriff adds: "It is no part of the beamer's duty to be inside the rails while the machine is working. It is no part of the beamer's duty to interfere with the machine while the cloth is in it." Now what happened was that, while the machine was working and the cloth was in it, the respondent, without any orders from his superior, placed himself within the rails and attempted to clean the slide of the mangle with a piece of waste, whereupon his hand was caught by the roller and was injured.

In these circumstances I am very clearly of opinion that the respondent was acting outside the scope of his employment, and that there is no liability. There are various other things said which it is necessary that I should advert to. There was a notice put up beside the mangle that cleaning of machinery in motion was strictly prohibited. The respondent had also been told that he was never to clean the machinery when in motion. I do not think that the disregard of those prohibitions would have taken away the liability if it had existed. It has often been held that mere disobedience is not enough. The point is, Was the workman within the scope of his employment? Now it was no part of the respondent's duty—it is so found by the arbitrator—to clean the machine at all except that, upon certain days, namely, on Tuesday from 4.30 to 5.30 A.M. and on Friday from 4.30 to 5.30 A.M., it was his duty to help somebody else to clean it, the machinery being stopped for that purpose. Now the time when he was hurt was not at one of those times; it was a different time altogether.

I think that that is what distinguishes this case entirely from the case which, not unnaturally, was cited by the learned counsel for the respondent, namely, the case of Mawdsley v. West Leigh Colliery Company.¹ There the deceased workman was employed to oil a mortar mill, but was told not to oil it while it was in motion. He did oil it while it was in motion, and he was hurt. The point of the case was put by Lord Justice Fletcher Moulton, and their Lordships held that it was a mere disobedience of an order. Now in this case the respondent had no general employment to clean the machine, but a special employment to clean the machine for an hour early on the morning of Tuesday and an hour early on the morning of Friday, when special preparations were made. What I wish to say is this, that the respondent could be under no mistake as to whether he was doing his duty. He could not think he was doing the duty of a Tuesday or a Friday morning; he was doing something on another day which he knew was not his duty.

As to the test that has often been put, I do not know that I need say much more, because I have said everything that I could say about it in the two cases of Conway v. Pumpherson Oil Company, Limited,² and Kerr v.

² 1911 S. C. 660.

*William Baird & Company, Limited.*¹ In *Kerr's case*¹ I expressed it in July 16, 1913. this way—whether the man was arrogating to himself duties which he was neither engaged nor entitled to perform. The matter is put still more briefly by Lord Moulton, then Lord Justice Fletcher Moulton, in the case of *Barnes v. The Nunnery Colliery Company, Limited.*² His Lordship says this: "The boy was only guilty of disobedience. Was this out of the scope of his employment, or only a piece of misconduct in his employment?" Now I think that is the test, and taking that test I have no doubt whatsoever upon the facts here that this was not a piece of misconduct in the employment, but that the respondent was doing something which he knew perfectly well he was not engaged to do and that he was not entitled to do. I am of opinion that the appeal here must be allowed.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD JOHNSTON.—The Sheriff as arbitrator found in the circumstances which your Lordship has fully narrated that the accident which occasioned the injury to the respondent in this case was one arising out of and in the course of M'Diarmid's employment, and awarded compensation accordingly.

I do not think that this award can be supported. As the respondent deliberately engaged in work which he was not employed to do, but on the contrary was forbidden to do, and which there was no emerging necessity for his doing, notwithstanding that the accident may have occurred in the course of his employment, it cannot be said to have arisen out of his employment. By his own unauthorised act he created a risk which was not incidental to his employment. The case is a fortiori of Smith v. Fife Coal Company.³

LORD MACKENZIE.—I agree with your Lordship in the chair. As I read the facts stated in the case, this is not a case where the workman doing his own work made a mistake, but the case of a workman doing what was not his own work.

THE COURT answered the question of law in the negative.

July 10, 1913. ON 12th March 1912 Steel & Bennie, Limited, shipowners, Glasgow, as owners of the tug "Cruiser" of Glasgow, and as representing the master and crew, brought an action against Tito José Evangelista, master of, and as such representing the owners of, the steamship "Taquary" of Rio de Janeiro, concluding for payment of £2500 in respect of salvage services rendered by the "Cruiser" to the "Taquary."

2D DIVISION.
Lord Hunter.

It was not disputed that salvage services had been rendered, and the only question was as to their value, the defender pleading that the sum sued for was excessive, and tendering £700 in full of the conclusions of the summons.

Proof was allowed and led, and the facts as ultimately held established by the Court were to the following effect.

On 25th February 1912, at high tide about 1 A.M., the "Taquary," of 1175 tons net register, went aground on the west side of Ailsa Craig. There was only a slight breeze and practically no sea, but the vessel lay almost broadside on to a rocky shore, and if she had remained there till low water her whole weight would have rested on the boulders beneath her, with the result that her side would have burst in and she would probably have become a total wreck. The "Cruiser," a tug engaged in towing vessels up the Clyde, sighted the "Taquary" about 7.30 A.M., some hours before low water, and offered her services which were accepted. There were other tugs in the vicinity, but they were engaged in helping another vessel and could not have come to the assistance of the "Taquary" before the tide was low. The "Cruiser" at once swung the stern of the "Taquary" away from the rocks and kept it there, standing by till about 3 P.M. when, with the assistance of the "Setter," another vessel which had come up about 1.20 P.M., she got the "Taquary" afloat and towed her to the Tail of the Bank, a distance of about 47 miles, and from there, with the assistance of another tug, to Glasgow. Shortly after she was floated off the wind rose to nearly a gale. In rendering her services to the "Taquary" the "Cruiser" was exposed to no risk. The value of the "Taquary" as salvaged was admitted to be £27,837, and that of the "Cruiser" £5500. The "Setter" was offered and accepted £450 for her services to the "Taquary."

On 20th February 1913 the Lord Ordinary (Hunter) decreed against the defender for payment to the pursuers of £700.*

* "OPINION.—The pursuers are the registered owners of the tug 'Cruiser' of Glasgow. They sue for themselves, and also as representing the master and crew of the said tug, to recover from the defender, who is the master, and, as such, represents the owners of the Brazilian steamship 'Taquary,' a sum in respect of salvage services rendered by the said tug to the said steamship. It is not disputed that the services rendered were in the nature of salvage services. The only question that I have to determine is the amount of the award.

"On 25th February 1912, being a Sunday, about 1 A.M., the 'Taquary,' which is a new twin screw steamer of 1942 tons gross and 1175 net register, went aground on the west side of Ailsa Craig. There is considerable conflict in the testimony of the different witnesses as to the exact position where she lay. The point does not appear to me to be of great materiality. I think that she was less to the south than was represented by the witnesses for the pursuers, and not so much to the north as represented by the witnesses for the defender. Her position may be taken as somewhat to the north of the point called the Boating Stone on the chart of the Craig. I do not think

Argued for the reclaimers;—The Lord Ordinary had misapprehended the evidence and had given an unreasonable award, and in such circumstances his judgment was open to review.¹ He had failed to appreciate the risk to the "Taquary" from the position in which she lay, especially if the weather had become worse,² and the consequent value of the services rendered to her by the "Cruiser." It was also a consideration that the "Cruiser" was the first to help the "Taquary,"³ and that she was a vessel maintained for the purpose of assisting other ships⁴—both of which facts entitled her to specially liberal treatment. The amount fixed by the Lord Ordinary was far below the percentage of the value of the salvaged vessel which had been awarded by the Court in other similar cases.⁵

that at any time she was broadside on to the beach, but undoubtedly the position in which she lay exposed her to great risk of destruction, in the event of a strong wind or sea from the south-west. At the time when she grounded there was practically no sea, and the wind, which was only a slight breeze, was blowing from the north. She was not therefore in imminent danger of breaking up. In the course of the early morning two steamers, the 'St Catherine' and the 'Woodcock,' communicated with her. The defender did not request either vessel to give him assistance in the way of attempting to get the 'Taquary' off. He was content to entrust them with the sending of telegrams to the managing owners and to the insurance company. This course may to some extent have been dictated by a dread lest the vessel, on being pulled off the rocks, might sink. At the same time I do not think he would have refused assistance, had the state of the wind or sea given him cause for immediate anxiety.

"The 'Cruiser,' which is a tug engaged in towing vessels up the Clyde to Glasgow, was, on the morning of the 25th, engaged in 'seeking' or looking for work, when she sighted the 'Taquary.' She is said at the time to have been in attendance upon the 'Hyltonia,' and expected to be engaged in towing that vessel. On sighting the 'Taquary' she went and offered her assistance, which was accepted. This was about 7.30 A.M., and from that time she remained in attendance until 3 or 3.30 P.M., when, with the assistance of the 'Setter,' a vessel which came up about 1.20, she succeeded in floating the 'Taquary.' The 'Cruiser' and the 'Setter' towed the 'Taquary' from Ailea Craig to the Tail of the Bank, a distance of about 47 miles. The Argued for the respondent;—The Court would not interfere with the award of the Judge of first instance, unless it was manifestly an unreasonable one and the amount given was grossly out of proportion.¹ This could not be said in the present case. On the evidence the "Taquary" was not in any imminent danger of settling on the rocks, and there were other vessels which could have come to her assistance. The labour and risk of the salving vessel were negligible, and the time occupied in the salvage operations was so short that only a trifling loss of earnings could be pleaded. These were all elements to be taken into consideration.² The principle of giving a percentage of the value of the salved vessel had never been recognised, and was rejected in the case of The Greenock Towing Co. v. The Anchor Line (Henderson Brothers), Limited.³ In so far as the value of the salved vessel entered into the question, the awards in "The Werra"⁴ and *Owners of "Vulcan" v. Owners of "Berlin"*⁵ were a better guide than the cases relied on by the reclaimers.

towing operations lasted about twelve hours. From the Tail of the Bank the 'Cruiser,' with the assistance of another of the pursuers' tugs, towed the 'Taquary' to Glasgow; but payment for this latter service has been made, and therefore does not enter into the present calculation.

"In rendering her services to the 'Taquary' the 'Cruiser' was exposed to no risk, and the lives of none of her crew were ever in danger. The work done was not difficult, and did not call for the exercise of any special skill in seamanship. The services were, however, certainly useful. In the first place, the 'Cruiser' had slewed the 'Taquary' round to some extent, so as to put her in a more favourable position to the shore. This seems to have been done in the early morning before low water. Thereafter she maintained her in position, acting for some time in conjunction with the 'Setter.' At high water the 'Cruiser' and 'Setter' succeeded, by towing, in pulling the 'Taquary' off the shore. When they started towing from the Craig to the Tail of the Bank the 'Setter' was in front of and the 'Cruiser' behind the 'Taquary.' The towing vessels, however, soon changed position, and the 'Cruiser' went ahead. For some miles the 'Taquary' was towed with her bow first; but she was so much down by the head that she had to be towed stern first. The two vessels experienced no difficulty in so towing her, but, as Captain Abram explained in his evidence, it would have been dangerous for passing vessels for the 'Cruiser' alone to have towed the 'Taquary' stern first. I think the services rendered by the 'Cruiser' were more valuable than those rendered by the 'Setter.' The latter vessel was not constructed for tug work, and was not so handy, or able to keep her position so well as the former vessel.

"If the 'Cruiser' had not rendered the services which she did, I think that the 'Taquary' might have got other assistance. I have already referred to the 'Woodcock' and the 'St Catherine.' About 11 o'clock the 'Tweed' also offered assistance; but the master of the 'Cruiser' refused the offer, as he thought he would manage to get the 'Taquary' off himself. Another vessel called the 'Copeland' had gone ashore on the north or north-east side of the Craig about the same time that the 'Taquary' did. Two tugs, LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is an action in which salvage is claimed by July 10, 1913. the owners of the tug "Cruiser" for services rendered to the "Taquary," which went aground on Ailsa Craig on 25th February 1912. We have had the assistance of a Nautical Assessor, and his views have been expressed to us with great care, and, so far as I am able to judge, and I think your Lordships will agree with me, with great acumen.

"Cruiser" v.
"Taquary."

I do not think that the exact place where the vessel struck is of great importance, though in that matter I am inclined to prefer the evidence of the pursuers' witnesses. We are advised by the Assessor that she was equally exposed to danger from the south-west wind in whichever position she was lying. As to the angle at which she struck the shore, if she was not broadside on, she was at least in such a position that her stern had a very short distance to drift before the vessel would be on the rocks throughout her whole length. If the wind rose—and we know that shortly after she was taken off the wind did rise to nearly a gale—she would have been carried on to the rocks. Apart from the risk from wind, she was in a very dangerous position. When she went ashore her bottom was scored and dented by the rocks for a considerable distance aft. This was at high tide, and if she had remained there till the tide was low, the whole weight of the vessel would have rested on the boulders which made these dents, with the result that her side would have burst in. In that event, as we are advised by the Assessor, she might have become a total loss, or at any rate her salvage would have been a very difficult task, requiring special apparatus and involving great expense.

This was the danger, the imminent danger, from which she was rescued by the "Cruiser," and, practically speaking, by the "Cruiser" alone, for in the 'Flying Serpent' and the 'Flying Scotsman,' were sent to her assistance. The 'Taquary' passed these tugs as she was being towed to the Tail of the Bank. Looking to the state of wind and weather at the time, I think that these vessels would have been in a position to save the 'Taquary' had she not been floated with the assistance of the 'Cruiser' and 'Setter.'

"It is admitted that the value of the 'Cruiser' was £5500, and that the value of the 'Taquary' as salvaged was £27,837.

"For the services rendered in the salvage operations the 'Setter' received the sum of £450. As I have already indicated, I think that the 'Cruiser's' services were more valuable than the 'Setter's' services. On the other hand, the 'Setter' sacrificed more in going to the assistance of the 'Taquary.' I did not, however, allow evidence as to the value of the 'Setter,' as it does not appear to me that the record raises a case for my estimating the amount to be awarded for the joint salvage services and allocating to the pursuers their proper proportion.

"A number of cases illustrative of the different awards given in different cases were cited to me. Each case must depend on its own circumstances, and I do not think it would serve any good purpose to refer in detail to these decisions. Keeping in view the different elements that appear to have weighed with the Court in arriving at the awards given, so far as they are present in this case—and I have endeavoured briefly to indicate them—I reach the conclusion that the sum of £700 is a fair award to make to the pursuers for the services rendered by them. As that amount was tendered before the action was raised, and was refused, I think that the defenders are entitled to expenses."

July 10, 1913. the work of getting and keeping her stern away from the shore, the "Setter" gave little, if any, assistance; though, at a later stage, when the "Taquary" was being towed to the Tail of the Bank, the "Setter" was of great use.

"Cruiser" v.
"Taquary."

Lord Justice-
Clerk.

The Lord Ordinary states, as I think erroneously, that the services rendered by the "Cruiser" could have been obtained elsewhere. It must be remembered that these services would have been of no avail if they had not been rendered at the time they were given. If her stern had not been pulled out before low tide, and before the wind rose, the probability is that she would never have been salvaged at all. The Lord Ordinary refers to the tugs which had gone to the assistance of the "Copeland." I am sure they could have done nothing. They could not leave the "Copeland" to come to the "Taquary," and by the time they were free to come, it would have been too late.

In these circumstances the question is, what is a fair salvage allowance to the "Cruiser" for what she did. That her services were immeasurably superior to any services rendered by the "Setter" I do not think there can be the slightest doubt. Estimating these services as well as I can, with the aid I have received in consultation with your Lordships, and without going into details, I think that the "Cruiser" is reasonably entitled to the sum of £1200, and I move your Lordships to alter the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary and to grant decree for that sum.

LORD DUNDAS.—I am of the same opinion. I think the Lord Ordinary has greatly undervalued the salvage services rendered by the "Cruiser," and that an award of £1200 would be reasonable and moderate.

LORD SALVESEN.—I agree. We have had the advantage of the advice of a Nautical Assessor—an advantage which the Lord Ordinary did not possess—and this has enabled us to look at the evidence from a more enlightened point of view than an ordinary layman is likely to have in dealing with nautical matters.

The first question is, what was the degree of danger to which the "Taquary" was exposed? The Lord Ordinary seems to think that the "Taquary" might have remained in the position in which she was stranded without incurring further damage, unless in the event of a strong wind or sea from the south-west. I think that is a misapprehension of the facts. On the course on which the vessel was, as described in her log, assuming her bow went ashore near the Boating Stone, she would be almost parallel with the beach, and her stern at no great distance from it. Even if the point laid down by Captain Griffiths, who was on board the "Taquary," be taken as the point on which she struck, her angle with the beach would only be, according to the Nautical Assessor, some 25 degrees, and her quarter would not be more than 90 feet from the beach at low-water mark. I agree with your Lordship in thinking that the position assigned to her by the "Cruiser" more nearly corresponds with the actual position in which she went ashore than that assigned to her by Captain Griffiths, and that she may be taken as having lain almost broadside on to an extremely rocky beach. In such a position, the action of the tide alone would tend to set her stern shorewards, quite irrespective of wind.

But there is a piece of real evidence to which the Lord Ordinary makes July 10, 1913. no allusion, which seems to me to demonstrate that the "Taquary" was in imminent danger of becoming a total wreck unless she had been salved by the "Cruiser" at the time she first offered her services. I refer to the marks on the vessel's bottom, to which our attention has been specially directed by the Nautical Assessor. These marks must either have been made at the time the vessel went on to the beach, or they must have been made at some subsequent time before the "Cruiser" arrived. I agree with your Lordship in the chair that in all probability they were made at the time that the vessel stranded, because the scoring on the bottom of the vessel as far aft as 60 feet on the port side, indicated that the vessel had been moving at the time the indentations were made. Now, these indentations show that there was some irregularity in the ground on which the vessel had stranded. The tide was then rising, and no further damage would be done until the water fell materially below the level at which the indentations were produced. If, however, the water fell away further, these indentations were extremely likely to be converted into holes, with the result that the vessel would have been absolutely lost. If, on the other hand, the indentations were made after she first struck, they are conclusive evidence of her having swung round closer to the beach, and in that case it was equally inevitable that, as she settled down on the stones as the water receded, her bottom would have been pierced aft of the forward bulkhead.

"Cruiser" v.
"Taquary."
Lord Salvesen.

Now, the "Cruiser" arrived before eight o'clock, some hours before low water, and her first care was to take the stern of the vessel further out by swinging her stern round towards the west, and I think it is in accordance with the bulk of the evidence that she succeeded in doing so. Even Captain Griffiths admits that she was swung between two and three points, although he seems to suggest that was merely for the purpose of lessening the hold that she had on the rocks, and that her position remained unchanged, a qualification which I do not accept. If so, the "Cruiser," entirely unaided, rendered a distinct and most valuable service, without which the subsequent operations would in all probability have proved futile.

The Lord Ordinary has also, in my judgment, over-estimated the prospective assistance which might have been obtained from the other tugs that were sent down to the "Copeland." These tugs did not arrive at the "Copeland" until 5.30, after the "Taquary" had fortunately been salved; but in any case they could not have got the "Taquary" off until the next high water, which was about four o'clock in the morning, and their operations during the whole time would have been rendered difficult by darkness. As I have already said, however, I believe they would have been too late to render effective assistance.

We do not require to assess the salvage remuneration due to the "Setter," but I agree with your Lordship that her services were very much less valuable to the "Taquary" than the services of the "Cruiser." Indeed, I doubt whether they were of any value except in so far as the "Setter" acted as a rudder during the tow between Ailsa Craig and the Tail of the Bank.

Under such circumstances, where we think that the Lord Ordinary has misapprehended the evidence, or has seriously under-estimated the value of July 10, 1913. the services which were rendered, we are at liberty to review the salvage award at which he has arrived with greater freedom than if we thought he had correctly stated the facts of the case, in which event it would only be where we thought there would be substantial injustice if we adhered to the award that we would review it at all. Even under the circumstances as they stand there must be some considerable and substantial difference in our estimate of the services from that which the Lord Ordinary has reduced to money. I think that such a difference is to be found in this case, and that the award which your Lordship in the chair has proposed is more in harmony with previous decisions than that of the Lord Ordinary.

Steel &

"Cruiser" v.
"Taquary."

Lord Salvesen.

The only two decisions of the Scottish Courts that have a direct bearing on this case are the decisions in the cases of *Duncan*¹ and the "Gantock Rock."² In the case of *Duncan*¹ the vessel had been deprived of her rudder and sternpost by a collision with a rock. The salvor obtained an award of £1500 on a valuation of the salvaged property of £31,000. In the case of the "Gantock Rock"² an award of £1550 was given on a valuation of £40,000. In neither of these cases was the peril so imminent as in the present case. In the "Gantock Rock" case² the vessel was uninjured. She was riding at anchor on a lee-shore and had safely ridden out a very violent gale. If the gale increased, as in point of fact it did, there was great risk of her driving upon the rocks; but her position was not so serious as the position of a vessel which is already on the rocks and which, if my view is sound, could not have safely lain there for another tide. In the case of *Duncan*¹ the vessel was afloat and was able to use her own engines, and therefore was not in the helpless condition of the vessel with which we are here dealing.

Having in view the greater danger of the salvaged vessel in this case, I think we are amply justified in giving the award your Lordship proposes; and indeed if the assessment of the salvage services had taken place in England I am disposed to think that a somewhat higher sum might have been considered appropriate, looking to the awards in the recent cases in the Admiralty Court to which our attention was called.

We were also referred to the case of the "Vulcan,"³ where an award of £500 was made on a salvaged value of £21,000, although the circumstances were entirely different and the danger to the salvaged vessel not at all imminent. I think it has always been recognised in the profession that that award represents the judicial low-water mark of salvage remuneration. Reliance was also placed on an Outer House decision of Lord Stormonth-Darling (the *Greenock Towing Company*⁴), where the extremely small sum of £350 was awarded in respect of salvage services rendered to a stranded vessel valued at £43,000. I can only account for that on the footing that his Lordship thought that the services, although of the nature of salvage services, were not much different from towage, and that the steamer would have floated off without assistance at the next tide, and as she had the use of her own engines and rudder could have been navigated safely into port; in short, that the services rendered by the tug consisted in merely pulling damage. On any other view of the facts the award in that case is quite irreconcilable with the whole trend of decisions both here and in England.

Steel &
 Bennie,
 Limited, v.
 Evangelista.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I am of the same opinion. The Court is always unwilling to disturb an amount found due by the Judge who heard the witnesses. We do not do so unless the amount found due is substantially either inadequate or excessive—so excessive or inadequate as in our opinion necessarily to involve misapprehension of essential facts. Your Lordships have incidentally dealt with the points on which we all think the Lord Ordinary has erred. I content myself with tabulating them. First, as to the position of the vessel. Captain Griffiths says that the “Taquary” was nearly at right angles to the shore. The defenders do not go so far as this, nor, on the other hand, do the pursuers maintain that she was exactly broad-side on. The question is whether she was not substantially broadside on.
 Apparently the Lord Ordinary thinks she was not, a view which the evidence seems to me to negative. Then the Lord Ordinary says that the “Taquary” was not “in imminent danger.” It seems to me, whether we take the pursuers’ or the defender’s views of the place where she went ashore and the position in which she was, that she was in imminent danger.
 In the third place, the Lord Ordinary says that the “Cruiser’s” services were certainly useful. It seems to me that that is a quite inadequate way of describing what she did. It would be more proper to say that her services were absolutely essential. Then the Lord Ordinary, in the fourth place, says that the “Flying Serpent” and the “Flying Scotsman,” looking to the state of the weather at the time, would have been in a position to save the “Taquary” had she not been floated by the “Cruiser.” As your Lordships have pointed out, these vessels were sent for a purpose which excluded the notion that they would be available for the “Taquary”; in any case, even if they might have been available ultimately, the evidence shows, and we are advised by the Nautical Assessor, that by that time the “Taquary” would have been beyond salvage.

“Cruiser” v.

Lastly, the Lord Ordinary says:—“It does not appear to me that the record raises a case for my estimating the amount to be awarded for the joint salvage services, and allocating to the pursuers their proper proportion.” Although, no doubt, we must confine our consideration to the particular services of the salvor now before us, it seems necessary to form an opinion of the total amount that should be paid. Considering the “Cruiser” only, and taking into view, first, the risk to the “Taquary” from which she was saved by the “Cruiser,” second, the value of the salvaged vessel, third, the nature of the “Cruiser’s” services, and fourth, the time taken, I concur in thinking that £1200 is a reasonable sum, certainly not out of line with the cases quoted to us, particularly those dealing with stranded vessels.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and decerned against the defender for payment to the pursuers of the sum of £1200.

WILLIAM STRUTHERS, Pursuer (Appellant).—*Chisholm, K.C.—

JAMES SMITH, Defender (Respondent).—*Sandeman, K.C.—
Hon. W. Watson.*Struthers v.
Smith.

Accounting—Fitted accounts—Discharge—Implied discharge—Agent and Principal—House factor—Accounts between agent and principal discharged half-yearly—Subsequent action for disbursements affecting the period covered by discharges.

A firm of house factors rendered to their principal half-yearly statements setting forth the rents received and disbursements made for properties managed by them on his behalf, and bringing out balances in his favour. On receipt of these balances the principal discharged the factors of all claims in respect of the half year's rents. The factory having come to an end, an assignee of the factors brought an action against the principal for recovery of the amount of certain tradesmen's accounts, alleged to have been incurred in connection with the properties during the period covered by the statements, and paid by the factors.

The Court allowed a proof, holding that the effect of the doctrine of fitted accounts was not to exclude the action, but to place a heavy onus on the pursuer of showing that the disbursements sued for were not in fact covered by the half-yearly statements and consequently discharged.

1st DIVISION.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

IN October 1911 William Struthers, a commission agent in London, assignee of William Barnetson & Sons, house agents in Edinburgh, brought an action in the Sheriff-Court of Lanarkshire at Glasgow, against James Smith, residing there, in which he claimed the sum of £85, 16s. 3d., alleged to be due by the defender to William Barnetson & Sons.

The circumstances in which the action was brought as disclosed in the averments appear from the following findings in fact pronounced by the Sheriff:—“(1) That the defender is owner of a property in Edinburgh, for which Messrs William Barnetson & Sons were appointed house factors in the year 1904, and that it was the duty of Messrs Barnetson & Sons to collect the rents, to pay all disbursements, including tradesmen's accounts, and to remit the balance to the defender; (2) that at each half-yearly term from 1904 to 1910, the Messrs Barnetson sent the defender a stamped account, signed by themselves, setting forth the rents received, the disbursements made, and the balance due to the defender; (3) that upon the receipt of the final balance due, the defender discharged Messrs Barnetson of all claims he had against them in respect of the half year's rents, and received from them the vouchers for the disbursements made; (4) that shortly after Martinmas 1910, Messrs Barnetson sent the defender a cheque for £100, as an interim payment for the rents then due, and that, on being pressed for settlement of the balance in January 1911, they resigned the factorship, and shortly after intimated to the defender that he was due them the sum of £69, 19s., being money which they had overpaid to him; (5) that shortly thereafter Messrs Barnetson assigned their claim against defender to John Robertson, solicitor, Edinburgh, and ten days thereafter became bankrupt; (6) that Mr Robertson re-assigned Messrs Barnetson's claim against defender to William Struthers, commission agent, London, the pursuer in this action; (7) that the sum sued for, according to the account lodged by the pursuer, is partly made up of tradesmen's accounts which were incurred in connection with the property in the July 16, 1913. years 1907 and 1908, and that, if these be deducted from the account, there is no balance due by the defender to Messrs Barnetson, or to the pursuer, as assignee of their claim." Struthers v. Smith.

The pursuer's further averments, so far as material to this report, are referred to in the Sheriff's note, quoted in footnote, infra.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(4) The accounts between the said William Barnetson & Sons and the defender having been periodically settled each half year for six years regularly, cannot now be opened up. (4a) The said Barnetson & Sons having accounted each half year for their intromissions, delivered up signed statements and vouchers, and received final receipts and discharges from defender, the pursuer is barred from this action.

By interlocutor dated 1st February 1912 the Sheriff-substitute (Craigie), before answer, allowed the parties a proof of their averments.

On 26th June 1912 the Sheriff (Millar), on appeal, recalled this interlocutor and pronounced one in which, after the findings in fact quoted above, he found in law as follows:—"That the parties having settled their accounts at each half-yearly term, and granted each other mutual discharges during each half year, from 1908 to 1910, they are not entitled to go back upon these, and sue for disbursements which should have been included in these accounts: Therefore assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the action, and decerns."*

* "NOTE.—So far as the facts that are found in the interlocutor are concerned, they were admitted at the bar, and are set out at length in article 7 of the defender's statement of facts. The statements and vouchers referred to are produced. The only answer the pursuer makes is 'Denied as stated, and reference is made to answer 1 hereof.' There is no explanation of this denial, although the particulars are given, but I understand it to refer to the averment in answer 1: 'Denied as stated, and explained and averred that it was quite understood by the defender that the half-yearly statements rendered by the said William Barnetson & Sons did not contain the whole expenditure incurred by the said William Barnetson & Sons on his behalf at the dates on which said statements were rendered.' As that was the only matter of fact in dispute between the parties, I should have remitted it to probation if the pursuer had made a sufficiently specific averment of the agreement, but it is much too vague and general in its terms. It is not said when or where it was made, or whether it was in writing or made at a personal interview, or what the terms of the agreement were. There is no reference in any of the statements to any such agreement, such as we would expect in sending the balance of the money due at each half year. The pursuer had opportunity of amending his record on this point, but refused to avail himself of it. Accordingly, I think there is no necessity for proof on this matter.

"On the law, I think there is sufficient justification for the view that, according to Scotch law, where the parties have met and settled accounts, and, after payment, have discharged each other of their obligations, it is not competent for one of the parties to go back and open the account, unless on the ground of fraud or error in fact, not due to any carelessness on the part of the person seeking redress. I think that is especially true with regard to a factor. If he did not correctly set forth the disbursements, the proprietor might find it very difficult, years afterwards, to check the accounts rendered to him. For instance, one of the largest accounts claimed in this case is for house painting, and it might be very difficult, years after this work had been done, for the defender to say that the account had been

July 16, 1913. Against this interlocutor the pursuer appealed to the Court of Session, and the case was heard before the First Division on 16th July 1913.

Struthers v.
Smith.

Argued for the appellant;—The Sheriff was wrong in holding that there was anything in the terms of the accounts and discharges passing between the parties which barred the pursuer from prosecuting this claim. Such was not the effect of the doctrine of "fitted accounts." The finality of each half-yearly transaction was not necessarily to be inferred from the course of dealing between the parties, and unless the defender could show that such an inference was necessary he could not resist the pursuer's demand for a proof. At the highest there was only a presumption of finality which the pursuer was entitled to rebut.¹ In two of the Scots cases cited by the Sheriff proof had been allowed,² the third, Stewart v. Maconochie,³ had been decided in very special circumstances and was no authority for the general proposition he sought to apply to this case.

Argued for the respondent;—The accounts were prima facie evidence of the financial relation of the parties, and there was accordingly a presumption that each settlement was a final settlement up to date.⁴ No doubt it was open to either party to come forward subsequently and to show that there had been a mistake, but in order to rebut the presumption he must found his case on much more substantial averments than were contained in the present record.⁵

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case the assignee of the assignee of a firm of house factors (William Barnetson & Sons) sues the principal who employed that firm for a sum said to be due upon a true accounting between the parties. The firm was employed to manage certain properties which were situated in Edinburgh and which belonged to the principal who dwelt elsewhere, and the management consisted in the usual work of a house factor, namely, collecting the rents and also seeing to the upkeep of the property, so far as that upkeep of the property devolved upon the landlord in accordance with the properly incurred. Again, it would deprive the owner of the property of the opportunity of considering whether the administration of the factor was such that he should retain him or dispense with his services. Further, a person of limited income derived from property might be encouraged to spend money which, if he were called upon afterwards to repay, might place him in very straitened circumstances. As to the authorities, I would refer to paragraph 585 of Bell's Principles, and the cases quoted there, and also to the case of Cameron v. Henderson and Others, 18 R. 728, and the cases there quoted, especially those of Stewart v. Maconochie, 14 S. 412, and Russell's Trustees v. Russell, 13 R. 331. In the English law the doctrine of settled accounts is well established—Cave v. Mills, (1862) 31 L. J., Ct. of Ex. 265; Hunter v. Belcher, 2 De Gex, Jones, & Smith's Reps. 194; Attorney-General v. Brooksbank, 2 Young & Jervis' Reps. 37; and the case referred to in II. Smith's Leading Cases, 433 to 436.

"Upon the admitted facts, I think the defender is entitled to absolvitor in this case."

rules of law governing these matters. Accordingly, in each statement which July 16, 1913. the factors made to their principal they begin by debiting themselves with the sums received from the tenants and taking credit for the tradesmen's accounts and other disbursements made by them during the period covered by the statement. The relationship between the parties seems to have lasted for seven years, during which period statements were rendered by the factors to their principal half yearly, but in January 1911 the factors resigned their position. The sum of £100 had been paid by the factors to their principal at Martinmas 1910, and when the factors resigned they rendered a half-yearly statement for the period ending Martinmas 1910 showing a balance of £69, 19s. due to them. Soon after the factors rendered an amended statement showing £85, 16s. 3d. as due to them. This is the claim that is made by the assignee of the house factors, who is the pursuer in the action.

Struthers v.
Smith.

Ld. President.

The learned Sheriff-substitute before whom the case came to depend allowed a proof. Contrary to what one would have expected the pursuer appealed to the Sheriff, and he seems to have maintained before the Sheriff, and indeed in no other view is the fact of the appeal at all explicable, that in respect that he produced vouchers for the payments which he says were made by the factors on behalf of the defender he was entitled to decree de plano. The learned Sheriff took a different view of the case from his substitute, and held that, as these half-yearly accounts had been rendered, the principle of fitted accounts applied, and that the defender was accordingly entitled to immediate absolvitor.

I am sorry I cannot agree with the learned Sheriff, but I do not think that is the principle of what is called fitted accounts. I have always understood that there are two possible situations. On the one hand you might have an absolute discharge by A in favour of B, in which case the matter is ended, unless that discharge can be reduced on the appropriate averments of fraud, essential error, or something of that sort. On the other hand, there is the case where you have what are known as "fitted accounts," which do not constitute a discharge, but which raise a presumption that there has been a final settlement between the parties. The law on this question was laid down in the well-known case of *Laing v. Laing*¹ by Lord President Inglis, at that time Lord Justice-Clerk, who pointed out that the effect of a docquet was to reverse the onus and was not to exclude inquiry altogether, and that he who avers that the account is wrong must be put to explicit proof of that fact. Now, in this case, although in the strict sense of the word there was no docquet on the accounts, there was something which was exactly equivalent to a docquet. The accounts were rendered half yearly, and it was the duty of the house factors to put down the whole disbursements made by them during the period covered by the statement. No doubt two things might have happened to prevent them from doing so. Tradesmen's accounts are not always rendered with absolute punctuality, and sometimes the period at which they are rendered does not correspond to the period for which the factors' statement is rendered. If a tradesman's account has not been rendered in time to be included in the factors' statement, it is quite clear that the factors' right to recover would not on that account be excluded; or

July 16, 1913. again, if there had been a case of mere incuria, it would have been in the power of the factors to say, "Here is an account which we have omitted to charge against you in our previous statement, and we are entitled to claim payment of it now." I think all that is clear, but I also think that it is always to be presumed that the factors would not omit from their statements any account that had been paid by them, and that the onus is very strong against the person who alleges that there has been such an omission. From the nature of the case here there can only have been one discharge in the proper sense of the word. It was always the factors who had to give money to the principal, and it would be the principal who had to discharge the accounts. But I think that the fact that the factors put in a certain sum as disbursements has the same effect in law as if they had docqueted the accounts, "these are our disbursements during the period."

That being so, it seems to be impossible to hold the case absolutely concluded. There must be a proof as the Sheriff-substitute has said, but in taking that proof he must bear in mind that the effect of these accounts is just the same as if they had been docqueted, and that the onus is upon the pursuer to show that they do not include all the disbursements that have been made, for, unless he clearly shows that the money is still due to him, then the docquet, so to speak, will prevail.

In view of the fact that the whole trouble and expense since the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute has been caused by the pursuer, and that he is now only getting what the Sheriff-substitute allowed him, I think the pursuer should bear the whole expenses of the process since the date of the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor.

LORD KINNEAR, LORD JOHNSTON, and LORD MACKENZIE concurred.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor appealed against, and allowed a proof.

Paton v.

Dixon,

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), First Schedule, (1) (b)—Where incapacity "results" from the injury—Return to work after the accident—Supervening aneurism.

A miner strained his back on 7th December 1911, and in consequence became incapacitated for work. On 1st May 1912 a medical referee certified that he would be able to resume his usual work in three weeks, and he returned to work on 27th May. He continued to work, doing a full shift at the coal face, until 15th August, when he became totally incapacitated, and was found to be suffering from dilatation of the heart caused by an aneurism of the aorta. He did not feel pain in the cardiac region until July, and the doctors who had attended him previously, including the medical referee, had not noticed any symptoms of heart trouble. In a claim for compensation the arbitrator was of opinion that the aneurism was caused by the miner being engaged between May and August at work which was beyond his physical powers, and found that his present incapacity was not due to the accident of 7th December.

Held that the arbitrator was entitled to arrive at that decision.

In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, July 16, 1913. in the Sheriff Court at Hamilton, in which John Paton claimed compensation from William Dixon, Limited, the Sheriff-substitute (Shennan) refused compensation, and at the request of the workman stated a case for appeal.

Paton v.
William
Dixon,
Limited.

The case set forth :—

1st Division.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

"(1) The appellant, who is forty-two years of age, was on 7th December 1911 a workman in the respondents' employment at No. 3 Pit, Blantyre Colliery. He was employed as a miner at the coal face. (2) On that day when he was throwing out lumps of coal he twisted his back and racked himself. (3) He went out to his work the following day, but his back became so painful that he took to his bed. (4) The respondents paid him compensation of 16s. 3d. per week in respect of total incapacity until 17th February 1912, and thereafter in respect of partial incapacity 10s. per week, until 3rd March 1912, when the amount was reduced to 8s. 3d. per week. (5) A dispute having arisen between the parties as to the appellant's capacity for work, they agreed to refer the matter to a medical referee. On 1st May 1912 the medical referee certified that the appellant was then able for light work, and that if he could obtain this he would be ready for his usual work in three weeks. (6) The respondents stopped payment of compensation on 22nd May 1912, and the appellant makes no claim for compensation for the period between that date and 15th August 1912. (7) The appellant resumed his old work on 27th May 1912, and worked on until 15th August 1912. During that period he was being paid the full shift rate, and from the middle of June he worked with great regularity and gave satisfaction to his employers. He may have found the work harder, but the usual output of coal was obtained and no complaints were made at the time that he did less than his share of the work. (8) On 15th August the appellant again became totally incapacitated for work. It was then discovered that he was suffering from symptoms of cardiac dilatation. This was subsequently diagnosed as due to an aneurism of the aorta which will permanently incapacitate him for work. (9) The appellant was not troubled with pain in the cardiac region until July 1912, nor did any of the medical men (including the medical referee) who examined him at or before 1st May 1912, find any reason to suspect cardiac trouble.

"In my opinion the aneurism from which the appellant suffers resulted from the continuous strain put on his heart muscles while he was working between 27th May 1912 and 15th August 1912. He was then doing work beyond his physical powers. I held that the incapacity from which he has suffered since 15th August 1912, was not proved to be due to the accident of 7th December 1911."

The question of law for the opinion of the Court was :—"On the foregoing facts was the arbiter wrong in holding that the appellant's incapacity since 15th August 1912, is not due to the accident of 7th December 1911?"

The case was heard before the First Division on 12th June 1913.

Argued for the appellant ;—The enfeebled condition in which the appellant had returned to his work was due to the accident of 7th December 1911, and what had formerly been his usual work had become overwork in consequence of that enfeebled condition. The chain of causation between the accident and his present incapacity

July 16, 1913. was therefore unbroken.¹ It could not be said here that the workman had been guilty of any unreasonable conduct which amounted to a new element introduced into the chain of causation. His conduct, on the contrary, had been entirely reasonable, for he had followed competent medical advice in returning to work when he did.² Nor was the workman's claim here barred by a conclusive finding of a medical referee that he had completely recovered in May—the referee's report here did not amount to any such finding.³ Moreover, although the payment of compensation had de facto ceased, it had not been formally determined, and therefore the original claim was still a continuing process.⁴

Paton v.
William
Dixon,
Limited.

Argued for the respondents ;—No cardiac trouble had been found to follow upon the appellant's strain on 7th December 1911, and the incapacity which subsequently developed could not be attributed to the strain except as a mere matter of speculation. But speculation was not sufficient; the applicant was bound to prove that his incapacity was, as a matter of fact, the result of the accident.⁵ That he had failed to do here. Such an inference of fact as the Court were asked to draw would never be drawn where the arbitrator, who was the judge of fact, had taken an opposite view. The applicant had failed to prove that he could never have had heart trouble in August unless he had met with the accident in December. He had in fact himself introduced a new cause by undertaking work he was not fit for, and had thus effectually broken any chain of causation between the accident and his subsequent incapacity. In that state of the facts the arbitrator was amply justified in arriving at the conclusion he had reached. Moreover, there was no process before the arbitrator until February 1913, at which date the claim in respect of the accident of December 1911 was barred.

At advising on 16th July 1913,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—[After narrating the facts and the finding of the arbitrator]—Now the question before your Lordships is, Can that finding of the learned arbitrator be supported on the evidence or can it not? I do not consider the case easy, but upon the whole, giving it the best consideration I can, I do not see my way to say that that finding cannot be supported upon the evidence. The whole point is, Is there a chain of causation between the accident which happened on 7th December 1911 and the state of incapacity in which the man is found in August 1912?—because I take it that it could not be said that there was an accident in August. I do not mean to say for one moment—I should be going very much against the cases if I did—that an aneurism of the aorta may not be in itself an accident. But, July 16, 1918. in the circumstances of this case, naturally that could not be said: that is to say, supposing you excised all reference to the accident in December, no one, I think, could have said that here the man suffered from an accident. There was nothing like the tightening of the nut in the spanner case; there was nothing like the over-exertion that was shown in the other cases owing to pushing something heavy or doing some particular act. So far this case would have been upon all-fours with the case of Coe v. Fife Coal Company.¹ I venture to quote, as really leaving nothing more to be said, what was said there by my brother, Lord Kinnear. Discussing the word “accident” in the light of the House of Lords’ judgment in the well-known case of Fenton v. Thorley,² he said: “It seems to me that all these interpretations of the word point to some particular event or occurrence which may happen at an ascertainable time, and which is to be distinguished from the necessary and ordinary effect upon a man’s constitution of the work in which he is engaged day by day. So defined, the word ‘accident’ seems to me to exclude the anticipated and necessary consequence of continuous labour.” The same view has been taken by the English Courts in a set of cases which I need not quote, where they held that there must be something in the nature of a definite event. In the case before your Lordships the workman need never have suffered from aneurism—upon the view of the learned arbitrator, who is the judge of the facts—had he not put himself to work for which he was physically unfit. In other words, the true cause of the disease was not the original accident in December, which, being a rick in the back, had, so far as the learned arbitrator finds, no connection with the disease at all, but his putting himself to and persisting in work for which he was physically unfit.

Paton v.
William
Dixon,

Ld. President.

It was argued—and that is just the novel point in the case—that the condition of physical unfitness was a result of the accident in December. My first remark upon that is that, although that may be so, it is not found to be so. We have not got a finding in fact that the man’s impaired physical condition was due to the rick in the back. But even supposing it was, I do not think, on the best consideration I can give it, that the result would be different, and I think a fair test would be this:—As a matter of fact, the man’s second period of labour was with the same employers as he had been with when he met with the accident in December. But suppose it had been with some other employer. Suppose the accident in December had happened under employer A and the heart dilatation under employer B. In that case it is quite clear that he could not have made any claim against employer B, because, if what I have said about the case is sound, the employer B would have said, “Oh, this is caused by your work pure and simple.” Well, then, could he have gone back to employer A and said, “I claim in respect of my accident in December 1911.” (I assume that the compensation had not been ended in such a way as prevented him making a new application.) Would not the employer A then have said: “It is quite true that you ricked your back, and if you could have shown that the effects of that rick in your back were still with you, I should have July 16, 1913. paid you modified compensation ; but you are not to saddle me with full compensation because you choose to put yourself to work for which you are entirely unfit." I think that is a useful test.

Paton v.
William
Dixon,

Ld. President.

As I say, I do not think the case is free from difficulty. But in a case which is not free from difficulty I think we always take the view, which has prevailed in the cases in the House of Lords, that when there is a case of doubt we are not entitled to interfere with the decision of the arbitrator upon a question which really is not a question of law but a question of fact, because the principal question of fact which decides the matter is whether there exists a chain of causation between the accident of December 1911 and the aneurism of the aorta in August 1912? I am of opinion that there is not, and I think the appeal should be refused.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I agree with your Lordship that the question is one of considerable difficulty. I think we must be satisfied, from the statement of the arbitrator, that there was no new accident between 7th December and 15th August 1912—I mean nothing had happened between those two dates which, in any reasonable sense of the word, could be called an accident. And therefore the question raised by the workman's application must be whether the incapacity which became apparent at 15th August can be traced, as a remote or indirect consequence, to the accident on 7th December or whether it cannot. I apprehend that is a question of fact, and that we are bound to accept the decision of the Sheriff upon that question of fact unless, upon his own statement of the specific facts which he says were proved to him, we can see that he had no evidence before him which could justify his conclusion.

Now I am quite unable to say that the Sheriff had not evidence upon which he was able to decide one way or the other. I think he had a difficult question to decide, and it appears to me that there might be two points of view from which he required to consider it. He might have to consider, in the first place, whether there was anything to show that the original cause of the dilatation of the heart, from which the man ultimately suffered, was the accident on the 7th December, because it may have been shown that the accident that then happened started the evil which developed later as the man was working. Or, again, it might be shown that he began work in such a defective physical condition, caused by the accident, as to expose him to the injury from which he actually suffered. Both of these are, in the first place, questions of fact, and I think the Sheriff negatives both. I am therefore unable to see any sufficient ground for disturbing his decision.

LORD JOHNSTON.—The learned Sheriff-substitute has, in my opinion, come to a sound conclusion. But it is not a question for this Court, as the Sheriff puts it in the case before us, whether the arbitrator was wrong in holding that the appellant's incapacity since 15th August 1912 was not due to the original accident of 7th December 1911, but whether there was before him evidence from which he could reasonably and therefore competently come to that conclusion.

A miner at the face on 7th December 1911, when throwing out lumps of coal, twisted his back and racked himself. He was off work till 17th February 1912, and received full compensation. He received reduced com- July 16, 1913.

pensation, as partially incapacitated, to 3rd March, and still further reduced till 22nd May 1912. But on 1st May 1912 a reference was made to a William Paton v.

his usual work in three weeks. We are not told whether he got or accepted Ld. Johnston. light work in May 1912. But on the 27th of that month he returned to his ordinary work. Down to July 1912 he worked regularly and full time, and had nothing to complain of. But in July he began to feel pain in the cardiac region, and on 15th August 1912 he became totally incapacitated, and was found to be suffering from aneurism of the heart. While the Sheriff found that the aneurism resulted from the continuous strain put on his heart muscles from 27th May to 15th August 1912 by work beyond his physical powers, he also found that there was no evidence to connect the aneurism as the cause of his present incapacity with the accident of 7th December 1911.

The appellant did not found his claim upon anything occurring during his period of work from May to August 1912. Had he done so, there would have been a case for consideration akin to Hawkins v. Powells Tillery Steam Coal Company,¹ though I think that there would then have been possible reason for excepting to the Sheriff's statement that the aneurism then discovered resulted from continuous strain when "doing work beyond his physical powers." That appears to be a pure inference from the presence of the aneurism, and not, as far as I can see, established by any evidence as to the development of the aneurism.

But the appellant based his claim on the accident of 7th December 1911.
That he met with an accident on that date is true. But he must prove that the injury of which he complains was an injury by or, in other words, resulting from this accident. I think the Sheriff was justified, on the evidence, in holding that he had failed to prove any connection between the two, and that, therefore, there is no ground for disturbing his judgment.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I am of the same opinion. There may or may not have been a chain of causation between the accident the workman met with on 7th December 1911 and his condition on the 15th August 1912. It was for the arbitrator to say, and I am unable to come to the conclusion that the arbitrator was not entitled to make the finding that he has made.

THE COURT answered the question of law in the negative.

No. 158. THE TRUSTEES OF THE LATE WILLIAM COTTON, Appellants.—

July 16, 1913. RICHARD FARMER (Surveyor of Taxes, Edinburgh), Respondent.—

Sol.-Gen. Anderson—J. A. T. Robertson.

Cotton's
Trustees v.
Inland
Revenue.

Revenue—Inhabited House Duty—Separate tenements—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. cap. 15), sec. 13 (1).

A large building, once occupied as an hotel, was let to a number of tenants, each tenant occupying premises consisting of one or more rooms. These premises all entered from a central staircase or from passages leading therefrom. All the premises were occupied for business purposes with the exception of two—a caretaker's house on the top flat, and an eight-roomed dwelling-house which entered from a passage on the second floor leading from the central staircase.

Held that the premises were "divided into and let in different tenements" in the sense of section 13 (1) of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878, and that each separate tenement had to be considered by itself for the purpose of inhabited house duty.

1st Division. ON 31st May 1913 a case was stated for the opinion of the Court by the Commissioners for executing the Acts relating to inhabited house duties for the county of Edinburgh, at the request of the trustees of the late William Cotton.

The case set forth:—

"The trustees of the late William Cotton (hereinafter referred to as the appellants) appealed against an assessment made upon them for the year ending 23rd May 1911 of £31, 16s. 9d., being inhabited house duty at the rate of 9d. per £ on the sum of £849, the annual value of the premises situated at No. 100 Princes Street, Edinburgh, of which they are owners. The assessment for inhabited house duty was made under 14 and 15 Vict. cap. 36, and the provisions of Rule 6 of Schedule B of 48 Geo. III. cap. 55.

"I. The following facts were admitted or proved:—(1) The premises, with the exception of that part of them occupied by Robert Smith, were originally built for and were occupied as an hotel, but after having been structurally adapted for use as in the year of assessment they have been for some years past, and during the year of assessment, so far as not occupied by the appellants' caretaker, let to a number of tenants who occupy the subjects let to them in some cases as offices, warehouses, or other non-residential purposes, and, in one case, as a dwelling-house. No part of the premises is occupied by the appellants personally, but their caretaker inhabits a house in the premises as hereinafter stated. (2) The premises consist of a basement, ground floor, and five upper floors. Part of the ground floor of the building consists of four shops structurally separated from the remainder of the building. The part of the basement beneath these shops is also structurally separated from the remainder of the building. Neither this portion of the basement nor these shops are included in the assessment appealed against. There is an entrance to the ground floor from Princes Street through an outer and an inner door opening into a large hall. In the hall there is a staircase and lift by which access is obtained to the upper floors; and there is also a staircase leading to the basement. Each tenant has a key of the outer door which is locked at night. The inner door is a swing door which is never fastened. (3) The basement is divided into two portions. Of these one consists of a washing-house and drying room July 16, 1913. used by the appellants' caretaker, off the latter of which a w.-c. opens, and of a lobby which leads to a coal cellar used by the appellants' care-^{Cotton's} taker, and from which lobby a staircase gives access to the hall on the ^{Trustees v.} ground floor. From the wash-house a door gives access to a passage, off ^{Inland} which there open two coal cellars belonging to and used by George Cotton & Son, tobaccoists, Princes Street. There also opens from the passage a door by which access is obtained to a flight of steps leading to a lane which communicates with Rose Street Lane. At the end of the said passage there is a door giving access to an open court; and from that court a door gives access to the other portion of the basement. This other portion is occupied by Messrs Oliphant, Anderson, & Ferrier as a warehouse; and from it a stair gives access to that part of the ground floor which is occupied by the said firm as a warehouse and office. (4) The ground floor consists of the hall mentioned above in article 2, and of three rooms occupied by Messrs Oliphant, Anderson, & Ferrier, as a warehouse and office. There is also a lavatory. Access to these rooms is obtained by a door opening into one of them from the hall above mentioned. There is also an access to one of them by large doors opening upon Rose Street Lane. The said firm also occupies a portion of the first and second floors, and the only access to this portion is by a staircase from one of the three rooms on the ground floor occupied by the firm. (5) The first floor consists of rooms occupied by Messrs Oliphant, Anderson, & Ferrier, as stated in article 4, of three rooms occupied by F. E. G. Hopp as an office, between two of which there is internal communication, of a single room occupied as an office by the World Missionary Conference, and of two rooms, between which there is internal communication, occupied as an office by the Empire Insurance Corporation. Each of these rooms has a door opening upon the passage which communicates with the staircase and lift. From the said passage there is a door opening on to a small lobby. Access is obtained from this lobby by a door to a room occupied as a warehouse by A. Brown, by a second door to the office of the Conservative Women's Franchise Association, and by a third door to two rooms occupied as an office by Messrs Ashford, Thomson, & Heaton. From the passage above mentioned there is a door opening into a small lobby from which access is obtained to a coal closet and to two rooms occupied by the World Missionary Conference between which rooms there is internal communication. There are also a ladies' lavatory and w.-c., access to which is obtained from a passage communicating with the staircase. (6) The second floor consists of rooms occupied by Messrs Oliphant, Anderson, & Ferrier, as stated in article 4, of a room occupied by Miss Fairley as an artist's studio, of two single rooms occupied by Mrs Feely and Mrs Fletcher respectively for business purposes, and of three rooms, between all of which there is internal communication, occupied as an office by Mr M'Crow. There is also a coal closet. Each of these rooms has a door opening upon the passage which communicates with the staircase and lift. There is also a large lavatory communicating with the said passage. From the said passage there is a door which gives access to the rooms occupied by Mr Robert Smith as his dwelling-house. This house, which formerly was a separate house with its own access from the street, is held on a separate title and consists of a lobby and four rooms entering therefrom on the second floor used as dining-room, drawing-room, bedroom, and kitchen, and four rooms used as bedrooms and a bathroom on the third floor. The only access to these last-mentioned rooms is by a staircase from the said lobby. (7) The third floor consists of the said four rooms and a bathroom, occupied by Mr Robert Smith, and of five rooms and a lavatory occupied by Cadbury Brothers, Limited. A door from the stair landing gives access to a passage with which each of the rooms occupied by Cadbury Brothers, Limited, communicates by means of a door. The door to the lift also opens upon this passage. (8) The fourth floor consists of six rooms let to tenants and occupied for business purposes and a lavatory. . . . Each room has a door opening from a passage which communicates with the staircase and lift. Off this passage at the west end there is a door which gives access to a stair which communicates with the house of the appellants' caretaker on the fifth floor. At the east end of the passage there is a door by which access is obtained to a stair leading to the fifth floor. (9) The fifth floor consists of four rooms and a bedroom, occupied by the appellants' caretaker, which all communicate with the landing of the stair leading from the fourth floor to the caretaker's house; of three rooms, two of which are let and one is vacant; and of a place for the cistern and lift machinery. The only communication between the caretaker's house and the rest of the building is by means of a door on, and a stair leading from, the fourth floor. Each of the said three rooms has a door opening on to the landing of the stair leading from the fourth floor to them. The caretaker's house is structurally separate from these three rooms. . . . (10) The various occupiers above named are entered in the Valuation-roll as tenants and occupiers of the premises held by them respectively, and they are separately rated on the rents paid by them.

" II. For the appellants it was contended that the only part of the said premises in respect of which inhabited house duty is leviable is the house occupied by Mr Robert Smith at a rent of £75, and that in terms of section 1 of 57 Geo. III. cap. 25, section 25 of 30 and 31 Vict. cap. 90, and section 13 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878. They further contended that in any event the said duty was not leviable in respect of the part of the premises which is unlet. They further maintained that as they were not liable in payment of the said duty on the remainder of the said premises, and as the house occupied by Robert Smith was the only house therein on which the duty was leviable, they were not liable to be assessed for the duty upon the said house, and that the duty was recoverable under 48 Geo. III. cap. 55, Schedule B (1), from Robert Smith. They further maintained that the premises, so far as they are used as a dwelling-house, are used for the sole purpose of providing separate dwellings, and that by virtue of section 11 (1) (a) of the Revenue Act, 1903, the value of the caretaker's house being £12 falls to be excluded from the annual value of the premises for the purposes of the said duty.

" III. The surveyor of taxes (Mr Richard Farmer) contended that the building is correctly assessed as one subject under the 6th rule of Schedule B of 48 Geo. III. cap. 55. That as the building is neither structurally divided into and let in different tenements nor occupied solely for the purpose of any trade or business, there is no exemption under either subsection (1) or subsection (2) of section 13 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878.* That section 11 of the

* The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. cap. 15),

Revenue Act, 1903, has no application in that the building is not used for the purpose of providing separate dwellings within the meaning of that section, and, alternatively, that if it were so used relief could only be granted to the extent of £12 in respect of the caretaker's house, which is the only dwelling-house of an annual value not exceeding £60. "IV. The Commissioners having considered the facts and arguments submitted to them, held that the premises were not divided into and let in tenements within the meaning of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878, section 13 (1), and that section 11 of the Revenue Act, 1903, had no application, and they refused the appeal."

The case was heard before the First Division (without Lord Johnston) on 18th June 1913.

Argued for the appellants;—The premises were "divided into and let in different tenements," within the meaning of subsection 1 of section 13 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878,¹ and of these different tenements all, excepting two, were "occupied solely for the purposes" of a "trade or business" within the meaning of the same subsection, and accordingly under subsection 2 of the same section, and also section 1 of the House Taxes Act, 1817,² which fell to be read along with the Act of 1878, the tenements occupied as business premises were exempted from inhabited house duty. With regard to the tenement leased as a residence by Mr Smith the appellants were not chargeable with duty, because it was the occupier who was chargeable, and it was Mr Smith and not the appellants who occupied the tenement.³ It was obvious that it was a separate tenement.⁴ The only distinction between it and the house in Corke v.

enacts:—Sec. 13. "(1) Where any house, being one property, shall be divided into and let in different tenements, and any of such tenements are occupied solely for the purposes of any trade or business, or of any profession or calling by which the occupier seeks a livelihood or profit, or are unoccupied, the person chargeable as occupier of the house shall be at liberty to give notice in writing, at any time during the year of assessment, to the surveyor of taxes for the parish or place in which the house is situate, stating therein the facts; and after the receipt of such notice by the surveyor, the Commissioners acting in the execution of the Acts relating to the inhabited house duties shall, upon proof of the facts to their satisfaction, grant relief from the amount of duty charged in the assessment, so as to confine the same to the duty on the value according to which the house should, in their opinion, have been assessed, if it had been a house comprising only the tenements other than such as are occupied as aforesaid, or are unoccupied. (2) Every house or tenement which is occupied solely for the purposes of any trade or business, or of any profession or calling by which the occupier seeks a livelihood or profit, shall be exempted from the duties by the said Commissioners upon proof of the facts to their satisfaction, and this exemption shall take effect although a servant or other person may dwell in such house or tenement for the protection thereof."

July 16, 1913. *Brims*¹ was that Mr Smith had to go upstairs and along a passage in order to enter his house, and the Act could not reasonably be interpreted as meaning that no tenement was a separate tenement unless it and the access to it were on the ground floor. With regard to the caretaker's house, it was not assessable for inhabited house duty, being of an annual value of less than £20,² and it was also exempt under subsection 2 of section 13 of the Act of 1878.

Cotton's
Trustees v.
Inland
Revenue.

Argued for the respondent;—The onus was on the appellants, who were seeking relief from assessment, to prove that the subjects were divided into different tenements within the meaning of section 13 of the Act of 1878, and they had failed to discharge the onus.³ A "tenement" within the meaning of the Act of 1878, or the Act of 1817, was, in the words of Lord President Inglis,⁴ "a part of a house so divided and separated as to be capable of being a distinct property or a distinct subject of lease." The various parts of the premises in question in the present case did not comply with this definition, and accordingly the building had been properly treated as a unum quid, and not being used solely for the purposes of trade was not exempt from inhabited house duty under section 1 of the Act of 1817, or section 13, subsection 2, of the Act of 1878. Even if Mr Smith's house was a separate tenement, the rest of the building could not be exempt from inhabited house duty unless it also was, as it was not, constructed as a separate tenement.⁵ The case of *Grant v. Langston*⁶ was distinguishable, because in that case the only access to the dwelling-house was by a door upon the street. With regard to the caretaker's house the provisions of the Revenue Act, 1903, section 11, relied on by the appellants, had no bearing whatsoever, as that section only applied "where a house, so far as it is used as a dwelling-house, is used for the sole purpose of providing separate dwellings," and the provision in subsection 2 of section 13 of the Act of 1878, relied upon by the appellants, did not apply where a property was divided into separate tenements as the appellants contended was the case here.

At advising on 16th July 1913,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an appeal against a finding of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, and has to do with an assessment for inhabited house duty made upon the premises situated at No. 100 Princes Street, commonly known as the Windsor Building. It seems to me that the question is one of fact, and fact entirely. The history of this legislation, as your Lordships know, is long, and has been illustrated by many cases. Originally, under the operation of the Act 48 Geo. III. cap. 55, and of the 6th Rule of Schedule B of that Act, if there was any dwelling-house in a July 16, 1913. British Linen Company,¹ when he says, "Is this case to be regulated by the judgment in the case of Coutts,² or by that in the case of Corke v. Brims?³" Cotton's Trustees v. Inland Revenue. I do not read what his Lordship said. I think, if you put it in that way, this case resembles *Corke v. Brims*³ and not Coutts.² I put my judgment in this way: I think that all those various tenements into which the whole building is divided are separate tenements. It is quite clear that, if you had the ordinary case of a semi-exterior common stair and a set of flats opening off it, there would be no question about that. Now, does it make any difference that, instead of having what I have called a semi-exterior common stair, you have a prolongation of the common stair by an interior passage? I think it does not.

Ld. President.

I quite agree that, if all you can say in fact is that there are various rooms in the house to which any person in the house has access, then the house has not been divided into separate premises such as I find in this house. My judgment upon the fact, as a jurymen, is that each of those tenements is separately let to a separate person who has a separate front door key to his own premises, with which nobody else has anything to do; and, in particular, that the one person who is a house occupier is entirely separate from all the rest, being entirely self-contained and kept by himself and having nothing to do with the rest of the house, except, I agree, that he has not only to come down the stair, but, in order to reach the head of the stair, he has to pass along a landing. I do not think that makes any difference. I think this house is truly divided into separate tenements, that the judgment of the Commissioners is wrong, and that relief ought to be granted.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I also agree with your Lordship. I think the question to be decided now is merely a question of fact, and I certainly agree with the observations made by your Lordship as to its not being useful to lay the plans which have been made the ground of judgment in one case alongside the plans which have been produced in the case under consideration in order to see whether there is any analogy between the one case and the other. The principles to be applied have been clearly defined. They were laid down by the Lord President in Russell v. Coutts,² and quoted by the Lord Chancellor in the case of Grant v. Langston.⁴ He only advocated the application of those principles, and made no comment.

It was pointed out in the case of the London and Westminster Bank,⁵ to which we were referred, that each case must be decided on its own circumstances; and it is, I think, apparent that the development of building, and the erection of large tenements divided into flats, or subdivided into different subjects, each capable of being made the subject of a separate lease, show how little use it is to go back to cases which were dealing respectively with a house in Banff and a house in Wick. In the present case we are dealing with a large building in Princes Street, Edinburgh, which had been converted, on account of the exigencies of the time, into different tenements.

⁵ 87 L. T. 244.

It is quite apparent, in regard to the dwelling-house occupied by Robert Smith, that it is entirely shut off and therefore satisfies all the canons that were laid down in such a judgment as that of Lord Brampton in the case of the London and Westminster Bank.¹ This house was formerly a separate house with a separate entrance from the street, and with a separate title, and the mere fact that in order to get access to it now one requires to go along a common passage, does not make it any different from flats to which access is got from a common stair. It is, of course, obvious that one cannot subdivide by contract merely. There must be more than that. I think that the description given of the subjects shows clearly, when the provisions of the Act of 1878 are applied, that the building is divided into, and let in, different tenements, and that the bulk of those are occupied solely for the purposes of trade or business.

Watson's
Trustees v.
Watson.

By his settlement a testator directed his trustees to realise his whole estate, "and thereafter (subject always to the discretionary power vested in my trustees hereinafter mentioned) to divide" the proceeds thereof equally among his children and the issue of predeceasing children. There followed a declaration that, "notwithstanding the power of division above mentioned," the trustees should have the most absolute discretionary power to retain any of these shares instead of paying them over, and to pay over the annual income only, derived from the share or shares so retained, or to pay the capital thereof by such instalments, and at such times, as they might determine; and a further special declaration "that the whole provisions hereunder in favour of my son J. W. are purely and strictly alimentary, and the same shall not be attachable by the debts or deeds of the said J. W., nor attachable by the diligence of his creditors," and that any share retained by the trustees under their discretionary power should be subject to this declaration. There was no ulterior destination of the shares of residue.

In a special case, in which the trustees stated that they saw no occasion to exercise their discretionary power, and were prepared to hand over J. W.'s share to him, if they had power to do so,—

Held (1) (diss. Lord Johnston) that under the direction to divide the estate among the truster's children a right of fee was conferred on J. W., which was not withdrawn by the subsequent declarations; (2) that, this being so, the declaration that the provision to J. W. should be alimentary was ineffectual; and, accordingly, that the trustees were entitled to pay over to him his share of residue.

July 17, 1913. ON 15th October 1912 a special case was presented to the Court by the testamentary trustees of the late William S. Watson, pawnbroker. Dundee, first parties, and by James Watson, his youngest son, second party, for the determination of certain questions which had arisen as to the share of residue of the trust-estate bequeathed to the second party under his father's trust-disposition and settlement.

Watson's
Trustees v.
Watson.

1st DIVISION.

The truster died in 1904. He was married three times, and was survived by his widow and by two children of each marriage. The second party, who attained majority in 1911, was the youngest child of the truster's third marriage.

By his settlement the truster conveyed his whole estate to the trustees therein nominated, and after making certain provisions for his widow and for certain of his children, directed his trustees (by the tenth purpose) to retain a certain house property and to apply the income therefrom on behalf of the second party during his life as a special bequest to him; and on his death to sell the property and divide the proceeds among his issue, or, if he predeceased or left no issue, among the whole of the truster's children.

The eleventh purpose of the settlement was in the following terms:—
“Eleventh. Upon the youngest of my children of my present marriage attaining twenty-one years complete, I direct and appoint my said trustees to realise and convert into money my whole estates (so far as that may not have been already done by them), and thereafter (subject always to the discretionary power vested in my trustees hereinafter mentioned) divide the whole free proceeds thereof equally, share and share alike, amongst my whole children of my former marriages and the children procreated to me of my present marriage: Declaring that in the event of any of my children predeceasing leaving lawful issue, such issue shall succeed equally, share and share alike, to the share which their deceasing parent would have got if alive: But notwithstanding the power of division above mentioned, I hereby confer upon my said trustees the most absolute discretionary power to retain the share or shares falling to any of my children instead of paying the same over to them, and my said trustees may, in their discretion, only pay over the annual income derived from the share so retained, or may, from time to time, pay the capital of such share or shares by such instalments, and at such times as they may determine. Further, I hereby specially provide and declare that the whole provisions hereunder in favour of the said James Watson are purely and strictly alimentary, and the same shall not be attachable by the debts or deeds of the said James Watson, nor attachable by the diligence of his creditors. And any shares or share which may be retained by my trustees in terms of powers above conferred shall be subject to the same declaration in every respect.”

It was stated in the case:—“When the second party attained majority in March 1911 the first parties proceeded, in terms of the direction in the settlement, to make an interim division of the residue of the estate. The second party's share in this division amounted to £1557, which the first parties still retain, and the income from which they have regularly paid over to him. The second party has now called upon the first parties to make over to him his share absolutely. The first parties have passed no resolution to retain the share of the second party, or of any of the other beneficiaries in terms of the discretionary powers conferred upon them by the eleventh clause of the settlement, nor do they see any occasion to do so, and, if they have the power, they are prepared to hand over the second party's share July 17, 1913. to him."

The first parties stated that they had been advised "that, by the terms of his settlement, the truster intended to treat the second party differently from his other children and not as in their case to confer on him a fee, subject to the exercise of the first parties' power to retain for his alimentary use, but to restrict his right to a liferent alimentary, and that the settlement implies a direction to retain his share." Watson's Trustees v.
Watson.

The contention of the second party was stated as follows:—"The second party, on the other hand, maintains that on a sound construction of the terms of the trust-disposition and settlement a fee of one-sixth part or share of the residue of the estate was conferred upon him upon his attaining majority, subject only to the condition that the first parties in the exercise of the discretionary powers given to them might retain said share for his alimentary liferent, or pay him such portions of capital as they might determine. As the first parties have not considered it necessary or advisable to exercise this discretionary power, or to impose any conditions as to the manner in which the gift is to be enjoyed, the second party maintains that he is entitled to payment of his said share. In any event, the second party maintains that he is entitled to dispose of the fee of said share by mortis causa deed of settlement."

The questions submitted for the opinion and judgment of the Court were:—" (1) Are the first parties entitled to pay over to the second party his share of the residue of his father's estate, if they are of opinion that it is advisable to do so? or (2) Are the first parties bound to retain said share of residue for behoof of the second party in liferent for his alimentary use? (3) In the event of the first question being answered in the negative, has the second party power to dispose of the fee of the said share of residue by mortis causa settlement?"

The case was heard before the First Division (consisting of Lord Kinnear, Lord Dundas, and Lord Johnston) on 5th July 1913.

Argued for the second party;—The initial direction to the trustees to divide was equivalent to a gift to the second party of his share of residue. The subsequent declaration that his interest was to be alimentary was ineffectual to limit the right already given. An alimentary fee was a legal impossibility.¹ As regarded the power of retention given to the trustees, and the declaration that shares so retained should be alimentary, it was not necessary to consider whether this declaration would have been effectual had the trustees elected to retain any share of the estate, as the trustees had intimated that they did not intend to exercise their power to do so. But it was clear that the discretionary power to retain, following upon the direct gift of fee, must be disregarded as repugnant to that gift, there being no interest, beyond that of the second party, which the trustees could protect by keeping up the trust.²

Trustees v.
Watson.

Counsel for the first parties intimated that these parties did not wish to throw any obstacle in the way of immediate payment if, in the opinion of the Court, this might safely be made. He submitted, however, that it was clearly the intention of the truster to treat the second party differently from his brothers and sisters, and to make the whole of the provisions in his favour alimentary; and that this intention might be, and ought to be, given effect to.

At advising on 17th July 1913,—

LORD DUNDAS.—[In his Lordship's absence his opinion was read by Lord Kinnear]—The principal question in this case depends for its solution upon the proper construction to be put upon the language of the eleventh purpose of the testator's settlement. The clause is unfortunately expressed. But it seems to me that its provisions fall under three separate heads: first, a substantive direction that the residue shall, at a prescribed date, be equally divided among all the children then alive; second, a discretionary power conferred on the trustees to withhold payment of any share so long as they think proper; and third, an express declaration that James's provisions shall be alimentary, and incapable of attachment by his creditors—a condition which is also declared to be applicable to any shares which may be retained by the trustees in virtue of their discretionary power. Now, under the first of these heads, the words of bequest give to the children alive at the prescribed date an absolute vested right of fee in their respective shares; and James undoubtedly has that right unless it has been taken from him by the subsequent provisions of the settlement. No question arises under the second head, for the trustees inform us in the case that they do not see any occasion to exercise their discretionary power to withhold payment of any of the shares, and that "if they have the power, they are prepared to hand over the second party's share to him." The whole question, then, comes to turn upon the construction and the legal effect of the third head. The testator's complete intention with regard to James's share is not made very clear by the words he has used. But it is at least quite plain that he did intend that share to stand in a different position from the shares of the other children. He declared it to be purely and strictly alimentary, and evidently intended to protect it in some way against the diligence of James's creditors. The question remains, whether he has effectually done so. I think he has not. It was, of course, quite open to him to have given James a mere alimentary life interest in his share of residue, with or without the power to dispose of the capital by will. Or he could if he so pleased, in addition to the alimentary life interest, and subject thereto, have given James a vested right in the fee, which would then have been at the son's own disposal, inter vivos or mortis causa, subject always to the alimentary life interest. But the testator has not done any of these things. He has begun by using words which give to James a right of fee like the other children; and he has nowhere declared that that right shall be limited to a mere life interest, or to anything less than a right of fee; nor has he made any destination of the fee itself, except in the words of the direction to divide among his children. It is not open to us to speculate as to what he thought he had done, or what he would have wished to have done, in order to limit James's rights and to exclude his creditors. We cannot construct machinery for carrying into effect wishes or intentions which are, at best, only matter of conjecture. We can but look at what the truster has done; and that is to direct the division of the residue among his children; to confer upon the trustees a discretionary power (which they see no occasion to exercise) of withholding or delaying payment; and to declare that the whole provisions in James's favour are to be alimentary, and incapable of attachment by his creditors. But such a declaration as this last does not, in my judgment, reduce the right of the second party to anything less than one of fee; and a right of fee cannot be limited, as a right of annuity or of liferent can, by a declaration, however emphatic, that it is to be alimentary. Such a declaration is a mere attempt to restrain the fiar in the use of his own property, and is, by our law, ineffectual to do so.

If the construction of this settlement which I have indicated is the correct one, it becomes easy to answer the questions put to us, and I do not know that one need go for direct assistance to any of the decided cases; but I should like to add a few words in regard to one or two of these. The second party's counsel founded strongly upon the series of decisions in this Court of which the Manderston case,¹ and the Whole Court case of *Yuill's Trustees v. Thomson*² are prominent examples, and argued that if, as he contended, the fee of the capital of James's share was vested in him and no ulterior interests or purposes were involved, any attempt to hamper or restrict his right as fiar must be disregarded. In *M'Culloch's Trustees*³ Lord Davey expressed his opinion that the cases of *Miller's Trustees*¹ and *Yuill's Trustees*² were decided upon a sound principle, and "that principle is this, that where a man gives an estate in fee, he cannot fetter or restrict the fiar's enjoyment of it by any provision which is repugnant to the idea of an estate in fee." In neither of these cases, however, was there any room for the suggestion here made, that the effect of the trust-deed was to create and protect an alimentary liferent in the person of the beneficiary. The present case is much more like that of Wilkie's Trustees.⁴ A right of fee was there given by the testator's settlement to his daughters; but there was an attempt by a subsequent codicil to limit them in the use of it. The codicil directed the trustees to hold the residue in their own hands for the benefit and alimentary use of the daughters equally, and to apply the same for their behoof respectively in such manner as the trustees might consider proper, and to pay them the capital and interest, or only the interest, at such times and in such sums as the trustees might deem proper and expedient, the said provisions being purely alimentary, and not to be arrestable or attachable by the debts and deeds of the daughters or the legal diligence of their creditors. But there was no express declaration that the daughters' right should be limited to a liferent, nor any destination of the fee to some other person. It was held that the share of one of the daughters, who was a party to the case, vested in her in fee, and that she was entitled to immediate payment of it. Lord Rutherford Clark said: "I hold her to be a July 17, 1913. fiar, and I do not think that the rights of a fiar can be restricted by the limitations contained in this deed. These limitations do not reduce the right of the legatees to anything less than a fee. They are mere attempts to restrain the rights of the fiar in the use of her own property. It cannot, Lord Dundas. I think, be doubted that creditors would not be excluded, and though a lifereint may be declared alimentary, such a declaration has no effect on a right of fee. Following the case of Miller,¹ I think that there is a repugnancy between these limitations and the right of fee, and that the rights of the fiar must prevail." These words seem to me to be applicable to the present case, if the construction I have put upon the testator's settlement is sound.

For the reasons thus summarised I think we should answer the first question in the affirmative and the second in the negative. The third question is, in my view, superseded, for its postulate is that the first question be answered in the negative.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree in the opinion which I have just read, and I only add a few words for the purpose of expressing my own reasons. I think it clear, upon the construction of the eleventh clause of the settlement, that the testator gives, as Lord Dundas has pointed out, a right of fee to all his children on the arrival of the date which he has fixed for distribution, for he appoints his trustees to realise and convert into money his whole assets, and thereafter, subject to a discretionary power, to divide the whole proceeds, share and share alike, among the whole children. There is no destination in favour of any other person. There is a direct and absolute right of fee given by these words to the testator's whole children, each to his own share; and so far as I can find, on any reasonable construction of the subsequent part of the clause, there is absolutely nothing to limit the right of fee so given or to give any of the children less than a right of fee.

I assent to the doctrine which Lord Dundas's opinion also assumes, that a testator, having given a right of fee to certain beneficiaries, may nevertheless go on to divest them of that right, if he does so in clear and sufficiently effectual terms. An extremely good illustration is the well-known case of Smith v. Chambers' Trustees,² where the testator undoubtedly began by giving a fee to his children but went on to authorise his trustees to make certain restrictions upon the deeds which they were to execute for the purpose of giving effect to that right, so as in effect to reduce the children's interest to a lifereint. The principle is very clearly explained by Lord President Inglis, and although the judgment of this Court was reversed in the House of Lords, there is nothing said by any of the noble Lords that at all affects the soundness of the Lord President's exposition—indeed I think the passage to which I mainly refer is cited in the House of Lords as the best exposition of the doctrine. And what he says is this:—Having explained that the effect of the clause then under discussion was to give an absolute vested right at the testator's death, he says, in reference to the clauses which followed: "It would be strange if the effect of that modification were that in certain events the shares should not vest at death. That July 17, 1913. would simply undo what has immediately preceded. . . . But it is quite possible that a provision may vest and yet in certain events be subject to defeasance." And then he goes on to say that, if the clauses that follow the vesting clause are resolute and not suspensive, vesting takes place as fully as if there had been no condition, subject always to the provisions operating the divestiture. And, accordingly, the ground of judgment was that the trustees were entitled to divest the children to a certain extent by giving them an alimentary liferent instead of the fee. But a condition of that being done is that the trustees should be entitled to do something which would take away the fee previously, according to the form of the language of the deed, vested in the beneficiaries. And there is nothing in this clause which enables the trustees to do anything of that kind. There is no power in them to reduce the interest of any of the children to a liferent and to give the fee to anybody else; but whatever they do in the exercise of their power must be consistent with the gift of the fee and in no way modified by what follows.

Trustees v.
Watson.

Lord Kinnear.

But there is, undoubtedly, discretion given to the trustees to retain the shares falling to any of the children instead of paying them over, and to pay over only the annual income derived from the shares or "from time to time pay the capital of such share or shares by such instalments and at such times as they may determine." That now raises the question, which Lord Dundas has considered, whether a discretionary power of that description is or is not repugnant to the right of fee and so objectionable under the principle established in Miller's Trustees.¹ I do not repeat what Lord Dundas has said upon that point, but I do not think it necessary that that question should be decided in this case, for the following reason:—All that the testator does is to give to his trustees a discretion either to pay over the whole of the income or a part of the share to each of his children, and that discretion applies to the share of the only child with whom we are concerned, James, exactly in the same way as to any of the others. Now the trustees have exercised that discretion. They tell us that they have considered the question and that they are prepared, so far as their judgment goes, to pay over James's share to him. He has, under his father's will, the gift of a certain share subject to a discretionary power in the trustees to withhold it if they think fit. But that power must be determined sometime, and it is, to my mind, completely determined when the trustees say "We have considered the matter and do not think it necessary to withhold any part of his share and are ready to pay it over."

Well, then, that leaves only one question, which is that which the trustees themselves say they have brought this case for the purpose of raising. It is argued that the position of James's share is totally different from that of the other children, and that, although they might be entitled to pay over the shares to the others, a question has been raised as to whether they are entitled to pay over James's share, because his interest is restricted to an alimentary right. Upon that I think the distinction between James's share and the other shares is not very material, but it is quite clearly expressed.

July 17, 1913. After explaining the discretion which he gives to his trustees as to all the children, he goes on to say: "I hereby specially provide and declare that the whole provisions hereunder in favour of the said James Watson are purely and strictly alimentary, and the same shall not be attachable by the debts or deeds of the said James Watson, nor attachable by the diligence of his creditors. And any shares or share which may be retained by my trustees in terms of powers above conferred shall be subject to the same declaration in every respect." Now the only distinction which that seems to me to make between James's share and that of the other children is plain enough. He says if the trustees resolve to retain any part of the shares of the other children, the part so retained shall be strictly alimentary; but the provisions in favour of James shall be strictly alimentary and not attachable by the debts or deeds of his creditors, that is to say, whether you retain a part of James's share or not, it is to remain subject to a restriction that it is for his alimentary use and subject to the exclusion of his creditors. I think that the question which arises there is whether that plainly expressed purpose is good or bad in law.

Watson's
Trustees v.
Watson.

Lord Kinnear.

I cannot quite agree with one observation of Lord Dundas in which he seems to put it as if it was for the Court to make machinery for the working out of a provision which was not clearly expressed. I do not see that there is need to provide any machinery at all. I think the testator meant to give his son the fee and, notwithstanding he had given his son the fee, to declare that it should be alimentary only, and that his creditors should not have power to reach it. I think that is totally ineffectual in law. The law is quite clearly settled that, although you may make a liferent or an annuity alimentary, you cannot make a fee alimentary so as to exclude creditors. It is open to the donor to provide that his donee shall only have the proceeds of the estate settled upon him so that these proceeds shall be secured for his alimentary use, and therefore to put the estate into the hands of trustees with such directions that they should be entitled only to apply the annual proceeds directly to his aliment and to meet the claims of such creditors only as are alimentary creditors. But, subject to that qualification, the law is that no man can have a right of fee in money or property and at the same time exempt his property from the diligence of his creditors. You cannot give a fee to a man and say to his creditors "Do not attach it." That is what I think the testator here intended to do, and he has done it ineffectually. That is a condition of the gift which the Court cannot sustain.

I agree that the questions should be answered in the way proposed by Lord Dundas.

LORD JOHNSTON.—The question in this case concerns the provision out of residue, so far as made for the testator's youngest son, James Watson, whether it is absolute or effectively restricted. Mr Watson was married three times and left six children, two by each marriage. James Watson his youngest child was born in 1890, was seven years old when his father executed his settlement, and fourteen when his father died. He attained majority in 1911. He was singled out by his father—evidently it could only be by reason of his comparative youth—for somewhat special treatment under his settlement. Mr Watson carried on business as a pawnbroker in two different localities in Dundee. He gave two of his elder children the July 17, 1913. option of each taking over at valuation one of these businesses. Then, ^{Watson's} fifth, he directed his trustees to convey absolutely to his son William ^{Trustees v.} Watson junior, "as a special bequest" to him, a shop, store, and two ^{Watson.} dwelling-houses in the Hilltown of Dundee. He, sixth, directed his trus-Ld. Johnston. tees as soon as convenient to convert into money the whole of his other heritable estate and invest the free proceeds in good heritable securities. The seventh, eighth, and ninth purposes contain provisions for maintaining his children during minority and for his widow, the latter of a liferent nature. The tenth purpose contains a provision "as a special bequest to him" for James Watson, the youngest son, out of the rents of a particular heritable property. The ultimate destination of this subject was for sale after James's death and division among his issue, whom failing among the testator's whole children and the issue of predeceasing.

The eleventh purpose is the residue clause, the structure of which is involved and awkward. By it the testator directed his trustees, on the youngest child of his last marriage attaining majority, to convert, so far as not already done, his whole estates into money "and thereafter (subject always to the discretionary power vested in my trustees hereinafter mentioned) divide the whole free proceeds thereof equally, share and share alike," among his whole children, with a destination over "in the event of any of my children predeceasing leaving lawful issue" to such issue of their parents' share. So far the provision presents no difficulty. The difficulty is created by the discretionary power above referred to. The clause in a confused way deals specially with the case of James Watson, the youngest child, and generally with the case of the rest of the children, more or less by reference only to what was provided in the case of James. But it creates further confusion by the impression it gives—at present I do not say more—that as regards James its directions were intended to be imperative, as regards the rest of the children discretionary. To quote the clause verbatim would be to waste time. It is necessary to marshall its details in such a way as to present the testator's ideas in less involved, and I hope more intelligible, sequence.

I exclude in the first place any direct reference to James, the youngest son. What then the testator does is to confer upon his trustees the most absolute discretionary powers to retain the share or shares of any of his children instead of paying the same over to them. I pause to notice that up to this point there is only expressed a direction to convert and divide, and the direction to divide is immediately, and not remotely or by reference, subjected to the discretionary powers vested in the trustees thereafter mentioned. Nothing is said about payment. The testator then adds "and my said trustees may, in their discretion, only pay over the annual income derived from the share so retained, or may, from time to time, pay the capital of such share or shares by such instalments, and at such times as they may determine." Accordingly the direction to the trustees is in effect to convert and divide, and to pay or retain in their discretion. Had the provision ended there, I think that there can be no doubt that the case would fall under the rule of Miller's Trustees,¹ and that there would have been no

July 17, 1913. good answer to the demand of any child for immediate payment of his or her share. But there must be held to be annexed, though only by reference, to this direction a declaration to the following effect, "and I hereby specially provide and declare that the shares or share provided to any of my children, Watson's Trustees v. Watson.
Ld. Johnston. or such part thereof as may be retained by my trustees in terms of the powers above conferred, are purely and strictly alimentary, and the same shall not be attachable by the debts or deeds of such children nor attachable by the diligence of their or his creditors."

It is necessary here, and before proceeding to the special case of James Watson, to determine the effect of these provisions in the event of the trustees resolving, which, as it happens, they declare in the special case that they see no reason to do, to retain the share of any of the other children. Two things are clear: first, that it is in law impossible to attach an alimentary condition to a capital provision, and second, that without the interposition of a trust, even a life interest cannot be made alimentary. Now we have here the interposition of a trust. We have also a discretionary power to the trustees to reduce the immediate beneficial interest to a liferent, although there is none the less a vested fee coupled with a declaration that the provision so far as retained shall be alimentary. That the alimentary condition cannot attach to the fee or capital sum is clear. But the question remains, can a liferent of a capital sum be rendered alimentary, a trust being interposed, where the fee is in the liferenter and not carried past him to his issue or other institutes. I see no good reason why a clearly expressed intention, the machinery being provided, should not be given effect to so far as is possible, merely because the intention was to carry the protection to a further point than is possible at law. I think that it is recognised that a gift of capital to be retained in trust in liferent alimentary, with a power of disposal of the fee, is good to protect the liferent¹ though the power of disposal of the fee may be made available for behoof of creditors. And I do not find that the situation which would be created here, were the trustees to exercise their discretion, is in any different situation. Hence I conclude that so long as the trustees retain the share of any child, that share as regards the income is protected, and that, as in Chambers' case,² no interposition of creditors can prevent them freely exercising their discretion. That in the last-mentioned case the trustees had also a power not merely to reduce the beneficiary to a liferent, but to give the fee over to his issue, does not, in my opinion, affect the question. In fact if Dr Chambers' trustees had chosen they might have retained for an alimentary liferent, without affecting the fee by any further exercise of their discretionary powers.

But we are concerned specially with James Watson's share of residue. It is with regard to this share, but in words which cover the whole provisions in his favour under the settlement, that the declaration which is imported by reference into the general clause distributing residue occurs. "Further I hereby specially provide and declare that the whole provisions hereunder in favour of the said James Watson are purely and strictly alimentary." July 17, 1913. The word "are" I read as equivalent to "shall be," and as indicating the fixed intention of the testator that, in all events, the provision in favour of James Watson should be alimentary. His intention is clearly effectual as regards the special bequest of the Hilltown property, which is a proper life interest with a fee to others, the property being retained in trust. Is it ineffectual as regards residue? I think not. For the intention is clearly manifested, and the means are in the trustees' hands to render it effectual. What is discretionary in the case of the remaining children becomes, I think, by necessary implication, imperative in the case of the share of James.

Your Lordships take a different view, and consider that the judgment I would propose here runs counter to the case of Wilkie's Trustees.¹ It is not therefore without grave hesitation that I adhere to the opinion which I had independently formed. But I do not think that the circumstances of Wilkie's case,¹ however weighty the authority, are so far the same as those of the present as to compel to the same conclusion. I am particularly impressed by the close collocation between the direction to divide and its rider, the discretionary power to retain. I think the wish of the testator manifest, and that "the right of the beneficiary must be subordinated to the will of the testator"² so far as the law can give effect to that will.

Accordingly I am for answering the first query in the negative, the second in the affirmative, and the third in the affirmative with the rider "so as not to disappoint his creditors."

LORD MACKENZIE, who did not hear the case, delivered no opinion.

THE COURT answered the first question of law in the affirmative and the second in the negative.

A tenement of houses was let by its proprietor to a company, and the individual houses of the tenement were sublet by the company to various subtenants. In an action originally brought against the company for damages in respect of an accident alleged to have been caused by a defect in the railings of an outside common stair, the pursuer afterwards called the proprietor as an additional defender, in consequence of a statement in the company's defences that the proprietor was the person responsible for the condition of the outside portions of the premises. The Court having found the company liable in damages and having assoilzied the proprietor, 1st DIVISION. ON 28th September 1910 John Kennedy, a miner residing at Shotts, as tutor and administrator-in-law of his pupil daughter, Jane Kennedy, brought an action against the Shotts Iron Company, Limited, for £250 as damages for personal injuries sustained by her.

The Shotts Iron Company were the lessees from the trustees of the late Robert Inglis of a tenement consisting of eight houses, and had sublet these houses to different subtenants. The pursuer averred that on the 9th of August 1910 his daughter, in the company of her mother, paid a visit to one of these houses, which was let to a Mrs O'Hara, and fell from the outside stair which led to that house and the house adjoining it, the accident being caused by one of the railings of the stair giving way owing to a concealed defect.

The Shotts Iron Company in their defences averred, inter alia, that the duty of inspecting and repairing the outside portions of the subjects lay, under the terms of their lease, upon the proprietors, and in consequence of this averment the pursuer called as additional defenders the trustees of the late Robert Inglis, and an amended record was thereafter made up.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The pursuer's said child having been injured through the fault of the defenders the Shotts Iron Company, the said defenders are liable to make reparation to the pursuer. (3) The pursuer's said child having been injured through the fault of the defenders Inglis's trustees, the said defenders are liable to make reparation to the pursuer.

The Shotts Iron Company pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The pursuer's daughter not having suffered any loss or damage through the fault of the defenders, the latter are entitled to absolvitor, with expenses.

The trustees of the late Robert Inglis pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The pursuer's said child not having been injured by the fault or negligence of these defenders, or of anyone for whom they are responsible, the said defenders should be assoilzied, with expenses. (4) These defenders being divested by a lawful contract of lease of the possession and control of the said tenements, had not, in the circumstances set forth, any duty in regard to the condition thereof to the pursuer, and they should be assoilzied.

Thereafter, on 1st July 1912, he pronounced the following inter-locutor:—"The Lord Ordinary, having considered the cause, finds the defenders the Shotts Iron Company, Limited, liable in damages to the pursuer: Assesses the same at £60, for which sum decerns against the said defenders: Assolizies the defenders Inglis's trustees from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Finds the defenders the Shotts Iron Company liable in expenses to the pursuer and to the defenders Inglis's trustees: Allows accounts of said expenses to be lodged, and remits the same to the Auditor to tax, and to report." * July 17, 1918.
Kennedy v.
Shotts Iron
Co., Limited.

* "OPINION.—There is no controversy as to how the little girl, Jane Kennedy, met with the accident and sustained the injuries for which the pursuer now seeks compensation.

"On the 9th August 1910 she went with her mother, about 8 o'clock in the evening, to visit a Mrs O'Hara at a house 23 High Tarboothie, Shotts. The house is approached by and up a stair of about fourteen steps, which affords an access common to Mrs O'Hara's house and a house adjoining it, occupied at the time of the accident by the witness Mrs Lennie. Both of the houses open on to a landing at the top of the stair. The stair and the stairhead or landing are protected by an iron baluster railing having a wooden handrail on the top. The two houses form part of a block or tenement of eight double houses known as Inglis's Land. After remaining with her mother in Mrs O'Hara's house for a short time the child, who was about four years old, went out on to the stairhead landing. She appears then to have leaned against one of the rails, and the rail giving way the child fell over on to the ground below, a distance of about nine feet, carrying the rail along with her. I have no doubt that the weight of the child, young though she was, was sufficient without the application to the rail of any shaking or other violence, to dislodge the rail, for it is proved that the stone at its base, into which it had originally been thrust and battened down with lead, was broken away, and that the rail had nothing to hold it in its place. It merely rested on the surface of what stone there was left.

"There is a conflict as to whether the rail which slipped over was the fifth rail from the top of the stair as averred on record, or the fourth. This seems to me immaterial; but I see no reason to doubt the evidence of the pursuer's witnesses that it was the fifth rail. There is no evidence, in my opinion, relevant to infer contributory negligence.

"The defenders Inglis's trustees are the proprietors, and the defenders the Shotts Iron Company are the tenants under them of the whole block or tenement. Mrs O'Hara, again, is a tenant of the Shotts Company. Are both the defenders, or one or other of them, responsible for the accident?

"It is maintained by both defenders that they are not liable in any way to the pursuer on the ground that there was no contractual relation between them and the girl Kennedy; that whatever might be their liability as in a question with the tenant of the subjects, Mrs O'Hara, they are under no liability to keep the premises safe and secure for members of the public who may happen to be Mrs O'Hara's guests or visitors, and the following cases were cited in support of that contention:—Cameron v. Young, [1908] A. C. 176; Cavalier v. Pope, [1906] A. C. 428; Laing v. Fox, [1897] 1 Q. B. 415; Robins v. Jones, (1863) 15 C. B. (N. S.) 221. In all these cases the accident occurred inside the premises which had been let. On the evidence in this case I am not prepared to hold that they have any application. Little, it is true, was said in the course of the lengthy proof about the exact nature and extent of Mrs O'Hara's occupation or tenancy, but it is not proved that the stair and the stairhead formed part of the subjects let to her as her house was. They could not well be, for it was a common stair. Accordingly it seems to me that any one lawfully using the stair was entitled to assume that reasonable care would be taken

July 17, 1913. The Shotts Iron Company reclaimed against this interlocutor, and the case was heard before the First Division (without the Lord President) on 1st and 2nd July 1913.

Kennedy v.
Shotts Iron
Co., Limited.

Argued for the defenders the Shotts Iron Company;—Liability depended on the ordinary rules of law fixing the duties of landlord and tenant to subtenants and to the public respectively, and under these rules neither defenders were liable, and at any rate the Shotts Company were not. This was not a case of a hidden danger or "trap," as the defect in the railing was obvious, or at any rate was known to the mother of the injured child. The injured child was not on the premises on the invitation of either of the defenders; she was a mere licensee,¹ and there was no contractual relation² between her and the party who had possession and control of the stair, whichever of the defenders this might be. But assuming that in spite of the absence of any contract between either of the defenders and the to safeguard them from danger by the person who truly had the possession and control of the stair and the stairhead.

"It was further maintained, however, that the girl Kennedy was a mere licensee permitted by those who were the owners or were otherwise responsible for the stair to be on it, but that unless she were on it upon the business or for the benefit of those responsible, they owed her no positive duty, and could not therefore be guilty of actionable negligence—that she was bound at her own risk to take the stair just as she found it, or, to use the words of Keating, J., in Smith's case, that in using the stair she took it 'with all its imperfections'—(Gautret v. Egerton, (1867) L. R., 2 C. P. 371; Smith v. London, &c., Docks Company, L. R., 3 C. P. 326). Clearly the girl Kennedy was not on the premises on any matter of business. But I do not read the cases cited as laying down the rule contended for. The decision in Gautret was on relevancy, and the averments were held to be irrelevant for want of specification. In Smith's case the view that the defendants were under no duty to the plaintiff because he had no business with the defendants was in effect negatived. It was held that the gangway there was an invitation to all persons having business on board the ship, not necessarily business in which the defendant was directly interested, to go upon it. I think that here the stair was an invitation to all persons having a legitimate interest to enter Mrs O'Hara's house to do so by means of the stair which was the only access provided. As said by Byles, J., in the course of the argument in Smith's case, at page 331, the bell of a door says, 'Come and ring me.' If so, then the person responsible for the proper upkeep of the stair owes a duty to the person who uses it, viz., to take reasonable precautions to safeguard the user from the risk of danger and injury. The present case seems to me to be within the principle of the judgment in Miller v. Hancock, [1893] 2 Q. B. 177. When the house was let to Mrs O'Hara, the stair not being let to her, there was an implied undertaking to maintain the stair so far as might be necessary for the reasonable enjoyment of the subjects let. In Miller's case no doubt the persons, who are referred to as 'using' the stair on the understanding that they might lawfully do so, were persons who had business with the tenant, and the person who was injured was a person who had been visiting the tenant on business, but there the subjects let were business premises. When the subjects let are a dwelling-house, it seems to me that the lessor or the person who retains the stair under his control must be assumed to sanction the use of the stair not only by the tenant, but by those who may happen to visit her. The premises let injured girl, one or other of the defenders might be made liable, it July 17, 1918. was Inglis's trustees, the proprietors, and not the Shotts Company who must be held to have owed a duty to the public in respect of this common stair,¹ whatever might be the duty of the Shotts Company to their subtenants. It was the houses alone which had been let to the Shotts Company, leaving the stair, which was the access to them, in the possession and control of Inglis's trustees. But, even assuming the stair to be included in the subjects let to the Shotts Company, then it had been sublet by them to their subtenants, and the Shotts Company had no liability to third parties who were there on the invitation of the subtenants, for they were parties with whom the Shotts Company had no contractual relation.²

Argued for the pursuer;—The defect in the railing in question was not an obvious one, nor had it been proved that it was de facto known to the child's mother. The question whether the child was there as could not be reasonably enjoyed by her otherwise, and it seems to me that such visitors are, just like the persons coming on business as in Miller's case, entitled to be protected from danger in using the stair provided as the access and the only access to the house of their friend. They are not only permitted, but they are invited to use the stair. Moreover, even in the case of a mere licensee, as I read the authorities, the owner or occupier of the ground over which the licensee is allowed to pass is not protected from liability if he places anything of the nature of a trap in the way of the licensee. Now the railing here was to the ordinary passer-by truly of the nature of a trap, for the defective rail when in position had to such a person all the appearance of being sufficient for its purpose, and he was therefore entitled to rely on its apparent sufficiency. It was not as if the danger or risk had been a perfectly obvious one in the sense that it was discoverable at a glance however casual. It might have been a totally different case if the railing round the stairhead had disclosed a gap due to a rail having fallen out and not having been replaced, and the child had fallen through that gap. In that case she—if a mere licensee—might have been bound to take the stair as she found it with all its visible imperfections.

"It is, in my opinion, proved that the defect in the railing was one which a person charged with the duty of keeping the premises in repair could easily have detected if only there had been reasonable inspection. On such inspection it would have been at once seen that the rail had no hold in the stone on which it rested. The stone had weathered and got broken away to the extent of nearly two inches. A shake of the handrail would have dislodged the rail. It had no grip in the wooden coping. That there was a good deal that required attention and repair at this part of the railing is evident from the fact that not only the rail which was carried away by the girl Kennedy, but the two rails next to it, were after the accident replaced by longer rails.

"There is a conflict as to whether the attention of Forrest, a foreman joiner in the employment of the Shotts Company, to whom the tenants were in the habit of making complaints and requests, was drawn to the state of the railing on the occasion of a not dissimilar accident which happened in 1907. I am reluctant to discredit Forrest, who denies that any notice was then given to him. I cannot help thinking that he would have had the railing repaired if there had been, but however that may be I am satisfied that, if he was charged with the duty of inspection in connection with the stair in question, he should have discovered the defect for himself.

"The question whether both the defenders, or, if only one, which of them,

July 17, 1913. a licensee or on invitation¹ did not arise in this case, for the lessor of premises had the duty to protect not only his tenants, but also those who visited them in the ordinary course and on the business for which the premises were let.² In a question between the two sets of defenders the true test of liability was that of possession and control.³ These were primarily with Inglis's trustees, and if they had not divested themselves thereof and transferred them to the Shotts Company, they would be liable in the present case; but the evidence clearly showed that possession and control had passed to the Shotts Company. The whole tenement, including the stair, had been let to them, and what they sublet were the individual houses, retaining the stair. There was therefore no room for the application of the doctrine of Cameron v. Young.⁴

Kennedy v.

Co., Limited.

Argued for the defenders Inglis's trustees;—There was no liability ex dominio.⁵ The sole test of liability was possession and control,⁶ is liable to compensate the child, is a narrow and difficult one. The pursuer maintains that both are liable, Inglis's trustees because they are the owners of the property, and the Shotts Company because they were charged with the duty of seeing that the premises were kept in repair. In any view, they maintain that the control of the property was confused and subdivided, and, no express or definite agreement having been come to, or in practice followed, with regard to outside repairs, that therefore both must be subjected in liability.

"In my opinion the Shotts Company are alone liable. No doubt with regard to premises like those in question the owner may be primarily liable in a question with a member of the public for their being kept in a properly safe condition, but there is nothing to prevent his so demitting the possession and control of his property as to transfer this liability to someone else. In the present case Mr Inglis, who died in January 1910, his trustees thereafter coming in his place, was in effect the proprietor. (As a matter of fact he had a nine hundred years' lease of the subjects, running from 1857, from the Shotts Company.) Prior to 1892 he appears himself to have let his different houses to various tenants, there being an arrangement between him and the Shotts Company that the latter should collect the rents for him, and that, on the other hand, a preference should be given to the work-people of the Shotts Company as tenants. The Shotts Company, as Mr Turnbull their manager puts it, were to have a first claim on the houses. How long that arrangement had existed is uncertain, but it was in force when Mr Turnbull first came on the scene in 1887, a previous arrangement embodied in the letter No. 74 of process having gone out of existence prior to that and there was no doubt that, as matter of fact, possession and control had passed from these defenders to the Shotts Company. These defenders had let the whole subjects, including both the stairs and houses, to the Shotts Company. The Shotts Company had accordingly de facto possession and control, and this was the consideration which determined liability in a question with a third party.

Kennedy v.
Shotts Iron
Co., Limited.

At advising on 17th July 1913,—

LORD MACKENZIE.—The ground upon which one or other of the defenders in this case is sought to be made liable for an accident to the pursuer's daughter, a girl of four years of age, is failure in duty to keep in a safe condition an outside stair leading to two dwelling-houses. In consequence of the defective state of the iron baluster railing the child fell through and was injured.

date. In 1892 Mr Turnbull concluded a new arrangement with Mr Inglis, by which the Shotts Company leased the houses from him themselves for seven years. The lease, as already noted, covered the whole of the houses in the block or tenement, and, necessarily, it seems to me embraced all the outside stairs which formed accesses to the houses. This lease was renewed from time to time, the last renewal being for seven years from May 1908. The terms and conditions are set out in letters passing between the parties, dated 17th and 19th February 1892. The important term in the present connection, that, namely, relating to repairs, is thus dealt with. In Mr Inglis's letter, dated 17th February, he says—'provided . . . all repairs inside the houses and offices be made by you . . . all outside repairs on the houses being of course done by myself.' In his reply on 19th February Mr Turnbull puts it thus,—'During the lease the cost of outside repairs to be borne by you and of inside repairs by us.' I read the two statements of the stipulation as substantially identical. It was quite naturally only the apportionment of the expenses connected with the houses which was in the minds of parties. I do not think that either party had in view the question of whose was to be the duty of actually executing the repairs. The question of who undertook this duty, with its resultant liability for negligence in the performance of it, must be determined, in my judgment, by what in fact and in practice was done after the lease was entered into. I have come to the conclusion that the Shotts Company undertook the duty of seeing to the necessary repairs being effected on Mr Inglis's property. Without examining the evidence in detail it seems clear enough that the actual working arrangement was that Mr Inglis, who was not on the spot, was to leave the matter in the hands of the Shotts Company, he, however, recouping the Shotts Company for any expense incurred by them in effecting repairs on the outside of the houses. In relation to their own tenants the Shotts Company were in the position of owners, retaining the full possession and control of those portions, like the stairs and stairheads, which were not actually let to their tenants. It was to the Shotts Company, and to them alone, that their tenants looked for any and all repairs, whether inside or outside their houses. They knew of no distinction or difference in this regard, and had no dealings with Mr Inglis. They were employees of the Shotts Company, and the rents of their houses were paid to the Shotts Company by deduction from their wages. Any expenses they were put to in connection with outside repairs the Shotts Company deducted from their rent when remitting it to Mr Inglis. But, before the accident to the girl Kennedy, with only one exception, if it be an exception, the repairs were all effected by the Shotts Company at their own hand without previous consultation with or notification to Mr Inglis or his trustees. On July 17, 1913. The defenders Inglis's trustees are proprietors of the building (being lessees for 900 years). The Shotts Iron Company are lessees from them of a block of eight houses, which include the two above mentioned. They are workmen's houses adjacent to the works of the Shotts Company. The pursuer was not a tenant of the Shotts Company. His wife, with the girl, was, when the accident happened, visiting a friend called Mrs O'Hara, who was a subtenant from the Shotts Company of one of these houses, the only access to which was by the stair in question.—[His Lordship here discussed the question whether she was aware of the faulty condition of the railing and came to the conclusion that such knowledge had not been proved.]

Kennedy v.
Shotts Iron
Co., Limited.

Lord Mackenzie.

The question then is whether there was a duty on either of the defenders, as in a question with the pursuer, to keep the railing of the staircase in a

the one occasion when they did notify Mr Inglis it was in connection not with a repair, but with an addition to the premises—the erection of new ashpits or outhouses. It has to be kept in view that the Shotts Company were the owners of many houses in the same locality in addition to being tenants of Inglis's Land, and for the repairs on these, both inside and outside, they were admittedly responsible in the fullest sense. It was quite natural, therefore, for them in practice to make no distinction between their supervision of their own and Mr Inglis's houses, and I think it was proved that they did not. A Mr Wellwood, who was in the service of the Shotts Company up to 1901, was charged with the duty of looking after the houses. Mr Wellwood lived in the district for some time after 1901, and died in 1908. He had gone to reside in Girvan some time before his death, and although he continued to receive payment from Mr Inglis of £2 a year down to his death, as a fee or gratuity for looking after Mr Inglis's property at Shotts, there is no evidence, except perhaps with regard to some clothes poles, to show that he actually took any hand in inspecting the premises or effecting repairs as Mr Inglis's representative. It was certainly not known to the Shotts Company that he did or was supposed to do so. The inspection after 1901 was all done by Forrest. Forrest was somewhat reluctant to admit that he was charged with a responsible duty in regard to outside repairs on Inglis's Land, but I am satisfied that in fact and practice he made no distinction between Inglis's Land and the subjects owned by his employers. It was to him that the tenants all alike applied when they wanted anything done. Their requests, no doubt, were mainly concerned with inside repairs, but, as I have already said, they knew nothing about any distinction between outside and inside repairs. It is noteworthy that after the accident to the girl Kennedy it was to Forrest that application was made to have the railing repaired, and it was he and another workman employed by the Shotts Company who repaired it. This they did without notification of any kind to Inglis's trustees, merely charging the costs in the usual way when the rent came to be remitted. I think it is somewhat remarkable that when this action against the Company was raised, they being the only persons called as defenders in the first instance, they made no intimation of the claim for damages to Inglis's trustees. I do not think that the Shotts Company disputed that if Forrest's attention had been called to the defective condition of the railing at Mrs O'Hara's house prior to the accident he would have attended to it. Forrest admits that he had, in relation to Inglis's Land houses, the duty of effecting such repairs as he saw for himself were necessary as well as those to which his attention was directed by the tenants, but he says he was not to be held responsible. It seemed to me that Forrest used these words without knowing exactly what he meant by them. But whether that be so or not, I read Forrest's evidence as in effect an admission that he was charged with seeing that necessary repairs safe condition. There is no liability on the owner of property ex dominio July 17, 1913. solis. Nor where a dwelling-house is let is there a right of action against the landlord by one who is not a party to the contract for defects within the subjects let—Cameron v. Young.¹ Where, however, a staircase is common to two or more tenants of the same landlord, there is a duty upon him to see that it is kept safe, not only in a question with his tenant, but in a question with those lawfully resorting there—M'Martin v. Hannay,² Miller v. Hancock.³ A distinction may have to be drawn, where the danger is not a concealed one, between those resorting for the purpose of business and those who are merely visitors—Latham v. Johnson.⁴ In the present case the necessity for making this distinction does not arise, as the danger was not obvious but concealed. The result therefore is that the pursuer has a good ground of action, the difficulty being to decide upon whom the liability rests.

The Lord Ordinary has held that liability rests with the Shotts Iron Company, and in this view I agree. Though Inglis's trustees are the owners of the property, the test to be applied in fixing liability is to ascertain with whom the possession and control was at the date of the accident—Laurie v. Magistrates of Aberdeen,⁵ Laing v. Paull & Williamsons.⁶ The peculiarity of the present case arises from the fact that the Shotts Company are themselves tenants from Inglis's trustees, though lessors as in a question with Mrs O'Hara. The position taken up by the Shotts Company is that the outside stair was not let to them, and that even if let there was no duty on them to repair it. This involves consideration of the terms of the arrangement between Inglis's trustees and the Shotts Company and the actings of parties following thereon. Prior to 1892 the arrangement with regard to Inglis's houses, as explained by Mr Turnbull (manager of the Shotts Company since 1887), was that the Company were rent collectors for Inglis and handed him over the rent. All the advantage was that the Company got the preference for their workmen for the houses. A letter dated in 1868 is produced, showing that the Shotts Company was at that time renting these houses, but Mr Turnbull is not able to speak to any arrangement other than the one made in 1892. It is evident that the Shotts Company then desired more complete control over the houses, because, as they say in their letter of 12th February 1892, they sometimes had questions about occupancy with workmen of theirs living in the houses. They accordingly proposed to lease the houses at a rent of £37, 10s. for a seven years' lease, Inglis keeping the were effected on the outside of the houses of Inglis's Land. He failed to perform this duty, and for his failure the Shotts Company are responsible. They were truly the persons having the control of the outside common stair so far as their tenants were concerned, and I think that Mr Inglis and his trustees were absolved from all liability to members of the public who used the stair to visit a tenant of the Shotts Company. It was on the invitation of the Shotts Company and not of Mr Inglis that such a visitor used the stair.

"In the whole circumstances I think £60 should be sufficient compensation, and for this sum I shall give decree against the Shotts Company."

Inglis replied on 17th February 1892,—“I am inclined to agree to your proposal, provided that during the currency of the lease all repairs inside the houses and offices be made by you, and that the garden fences be kept in a proper state of repair, all outside repairs on the houses being of course done by myself.” Mr Turnbull on 19th February 1892 wrote—“We are favoured by the receipt of your letter of 17th inst, with reference to proposed lease of eight houses at Tarboothie belonging to you, and have pleasure in agreeing to your terms, viz.—1. Duration of lease to be seven years from Whitsunday 1892. 2. Rent to be thirty-seven pounds ten shillings (say £37, 10s.) per annum, payable half-yearly. 3. The houses to be handed over to us in good habitable repair, and to be given up by us at end of lease in like condition, natural decay excepted. 4. During the lease the cost of outside repairs to be borne by you and of inside repairs by us. We will also keep up the garden fences. We understand that this closes the business.” The terms of these letters are quoted, because an argument was founded upon the slight variation in expression. I do not think anything turns on this, and I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the two stipulations are substantially identical. The argument for the Shotts Company upon these letters was that when they sublet to Mrs O'Hara they substituted her in their place, and that the duty of inspection and repair of the staircase, as in a question with the pursuer, remained as it originally was, with Inglis and his trustees. This involves, in my opinion, a misapprehension of the effect of the contract between Inglis and the Shotts Company, and of that between the Shotts Company and Mrs O'Hara. What the Company leased from Inglis was not the houses A, B, C, D, and so on, eight in number, but a block of eight houses. The whole subject was let to them, including the stairs of access. So far there was nothing to make any of the stairs common in a question between Inglis and the Shotts Company. The stairs were only made common stairs when the Shotts Company proceeded to divide the subject, and let to separate tenants houses which had as their access the same stair. They thereby made the stair common, and the necessary legal consequences flow therefrom. By letting the whole Inglis gave the Shotts Company possession and control of the whole, including the staircase in question. When the Shotts Company let to the different tenants, the obligations arising out of that possession and control remained with them. The fact that Inglis had to bear the cost of outside repairs does not prevent this. In the case of *Laing*¹ one of the parties was bound to bear the cost of the repairs, but the other defenders, the Town-Council, were held to have had the control of the street, and therefore to be liable.

The position of matters in regard to these houses was that down to 1901 the letting of them was in the hands of Wellwood, who was in the employment of the Shotts Company. He had charge of them before 1892, and continued to have charge afterwards. When he retired in 1901, another employee of the Shotts Company, Forrest, took his place. Forrest says in his evidence: “Since 1901 I have been the only person who has had supervision of these houses.” He proves that from 1901 down to the date of the trustees before executing the outside repairs, details of which were put to him, and the accounts for which are in process. His statement is that these

the Company's assistant joiner, proves that he took his instructions from Forrester, just as Deans, the plasterer and slater, took his instructions from Wellwood. It has to be borne in mind that Inglis was not resident on the spot, and could not therefore personally supervise his property. Wellwood had gone to reside in Girvan a year or two before his death in 1908. He seems to have continued to receive £2 a-year from Mr Inglis down to his death, but there is an absence of evidence of his having exercised any supervision after he left the Shotts Company. I think the letter dated Shotts, 18/12/07, written by his wife at a time when she and her husband were resident at Girvan, informing Mr Inglis that his property at Tarboothie was in good order, is not an item of evidence of any value. The only intervention on Wellwood's part during the period from 1901 to 1908 was that his wife ordered some clothes poles, the account for which has never been paid, nor was it ever rendered to Inglis's trustees. The tenants of the houses were workpeople engaged with the Shotts Company, and their rents formed a deduction from their wages. It is clear from the proof that it was to the Company, who were their employers as well as landlords, that they looked for both inside and outside repairs. The Shotts Company had the repairs done and charged Mr Inglis in remitting the rent to him. After the accident which has given rise to the present litigation it was to Forrester that complaint was made, and he, with another workman of the Shotts Company, repaired the railing.

The result of all this, in my opinion, is that what was left in Inglis's trustees was the bare ownership of the property. The possession and control were with the Shotts Company. I have considered the evidence given by Mr Turnbull, especially with reference to what he states passed at an interview between him and Mr Inglis, apparently in 1892. Nothing that was then said by Mr Turnbull can take off the effect of the proved facts in the case. Nor can I find that, except in regard to a notification received by the Shotts Company in 1892 from the sanitary inspector, there was any intimation by the Company to Mr Inglis before they did what outside repairs were in their opinion necessary. The amount expended on these may have been inconsiderable, but there is sufficient evidence to instruct what the course of conduct was. The Shotts Company did not act in accordance with the theory put forward by Mr Turnbull in his evidence that it was the duty of Mr Inglis and his trustees to look after the outside repairs of this property. Inglis was under obligation to pay for the outside repairs, in terms of his contract. The Shotts Company, as matters were dealt with, had the duty to inspect and keep safe the railing in question. It follows from this that it was upon the invitation of the Company, and not of Inglis's trustees, that the pursuer's child visited Mrs O'Hara, and was injured while doing so. The cause of the accident was a defect in the railing which would have been discovered if a proper inspection had been made by the Shotts Company. There was a failure on the part of Forrester,

July 17, 1913. the person whose duty it was to inspect, and there was thus negligence on the part of the Company. The Lord Ordinary has refrained from saying that he did not believe Forrest when he said he had never heard of the defect, and it was not necessary for the judgment to do so. It is significant that after the accident no intimation of it was made to Inglis's trustees. They were not originally called as defenders in the action.

Kennedy v.
Shotts Iron
Co., Limited.

Lord Mackenzie.

In my opinion the Shotts Company are liable to the pursuer upon the ground that they had possession and control of the stair and railing, and that in consequence of their contract with their tenant the pursuer's child was upon the stair as a visitor upon their invitation. I am therefore of opinion that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary should be affirmed.

Upon the question of the liability of the Shotts Company for the expenses incurred by Inglis's trustees I agree with the finding in the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. The contest in the case has really been between the two sets of defenders. Inglis's trustees were brought into the process in consequence of the defence put in by the Shotts Company in which they averred that they were merely tenants and had undertaken no obligation with regard to outside inspection and repair. They are responsible for Inglis's trustees being called, and ought, in my opinion, to pay their expenses as well as those of the pursuer. No question was raised as to the amount of damages awarded.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I had the advantage of perusing Lord Mackenzie's opinion and I entirely concur in the result which he reaches, to the effect that the Shotts Company are liable to the pursuer on the ground that they had possession of the stair and rail, and that in consequence of their contract with their tenant the pursuer's child was upon the stair on their invitation as a visitor.

LORD KINNEAR.—I also agree.

After a discussion on expenses,¹—

LORD KINNEAR.—I think it is quite clear that this question must be disposed of as Lord Mackenzie proposes. It is said that the pursuer ought to have found out whether the true liability rested upon the Shotts Company or Inglis's trustees, and brought his action against the right defender. He was not bound to know anything about the relations between the Shotts Company and Inglis's trustees, but he only made his claim against the person who had always appeared to stand towards him in the relation of landlord of the premises. But then when that person, having been called as the defender, says, "We are not really the landlords and somebody else is," that put it upon the pursuer to bring in the third party.

THE COURT adhered.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), sec. 1 (1)— Accident arising out of and in the course of the employment—Injury by falling slate during a gale.

During a severe gale a carter in charge of a horse and lorry within his employer's yard was struck by a sheet of corrugated iron blown from the roof of an adjoining building, and was injured.

Held (dub. Lord Dundas) that the arbitrator was not entitled to find that the accident arose out of the employment.

Adamson v. George Anderson & Co. (1905), Limited, supra, p. 1038, distinguished.

IN an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, be- 2D DIVISION.
tween Peter Guthrie and his employer, James Kinghorn, the Sheriff- Sheriff of the substitute of the Lothians (Guy) awarded compensation, and, at the Lothians and request of the employer, stated a case for appeal. Peebles.

The case set forth :—

"The appellant is a firewood merchant and carries on business at 47 West Bowling Green Street, Leith. The appellant's premises consist of a large yard on which stands his firewood factory, and are reached from West Bowling Green Street by a private passage, 17 to 22 feet wide. The said passage and yard are much exposed to high winds, and are surrounded by unsubstantial buildings. On the day on which the accident occurred—26th November 1912—the wind, between three and four o'clock in the afternoon, blew at the rate of 52 miles an hour or thereby on the top of Blackford Hill, 4 miles distant, and 500 feet higher up than said yard. No evidence was adduced as to the velocity of the wind in the appellant's said yard and passage or cart entrance. On said date the respondent, who was a carter and firewood salesman to the appellant, was leaving the said premises in charge of a horse and lorry loaded with firewood for sale, and while he was still within the appellant's said yard he was struck by a sheet of corrugated iron, which was blown off the roof of an adjoining building, a distance of about 70 feet. Said roof had blown off three or four times in the last few years, and on the occasion in question twenty-eight sheets of the said corrugated iron, which formed the roof of said building, fell into the appellant's yard, and three or four sheets were blown into West Bowling Green Street. The respondent's head was cut, three of his ribs were fractured, and he was otherwise injured. The respondent had been out all day with his horse and lorry, along with a boy in the appellant's employment whose regular duty it was to assist him. The accident happened between three and four o'clock in the afternoon, and immediately after it the appellant sent said horse and lorry loaded with firewood out in charge of two young boys. I found that the said accident arose out of and in the course of his employment."

The question of law for the opinion of the Court was :—"Did the accident which the said Peter Guthrie sustained on 26th November 1912 arise out of his employment with the said James Kinghorn, within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906?"

The case was heard before the Second Division on 18th July 1913.

July 18, 1913.

Guthrie v.
Kinghorn.

Argued for the appellant;—The respondent was not entitled to compensation unless he showed that his injuries were due to some special risk to which he was exposed by reason of his employment. In the present case he could not prove this; for the accident was of a kind to which all who had to be on the streets on 26th November 1912 were equally exposed.¹ The case of *Adamson v. Anderson & Company*² was distinguishable. The decision in that case proceeded on the fact that the workman had to stoop over his work, and so could not keep a look-out for falling slates.

Argued for the respondent;—The present case was ruled by Adamson v. Anderson & Company.² The point of distinction between the two cases on which the appellant relied was unsubstantial. In the present case, as in Adamson's,² the workman's attention was engaged by his work so that he could not be on the watch for objects falling from above. M'Neice v. Singer Sewing Machine Company, Limited,³ was also an authority in favour of the respondent.

LORD SALVESSEN.—The facts in this case are very simple. It appears that the respondent, who was a carter in the employment of the appellant, was engaged with his horse in the appellant's yard, which is situated near West Bowling Green Street, Leith, when he was struck by a sheet of corrugated iron, which was blown off the roof of an adjoining building a distance of about seventy feet. It is said, I do not think it is material, that the roof of this building, which was of an unsubstantial character, had been blown off on three or four previous occasions within the last few years; but there is nothing to suggest, so far as the knowledge of the appellant is concerned, that it had not been replaced in a suitable manner.

Now, these being the facts of the case, and the only material facts, the Sheriff-substitute has reached the conclusion that this accident arose not merely in the course of the employment, which is admitted, but out of the employment of the respondent. I am quite unable to assent to that view. I adopt the language of the Master of the Rolls in the case of Craske v. Wigan,⁴ where he says: "I think it would be dangerous to depart from that which, so far as I am aware, has been the invariable rule of the Court of Appeal since these Acts came into operation, namely, to hold that it is not enough for the applicant to say: 'The accident would not have happened if I had not been engaged in that employment, or if I had not been in that particular place.' He must go further and say: 'The accident arose because of something I was doing in the course of my employment, or because I was exposed by the nature of my employment to some peculiar danger.' Unless something of that kind is established the applicant must fail, because the accident is not one arising out of and in the course of the employment."

I put the question that was put by the Lord President in the case of

Guthrie v. Kinghorn.

Lord Salvesen.

Now, the only case that presents some difficulty at first sight is the case to which we were referred—*Adamson v. Anderson*²—in which the First Division held the other day that an accident occurring through a slate falling on a person who was working in a back yard was, upon the admitted facts of the case, an accident arising out of the employment. But then we have not the same facts admitted in this case as were admitted there. The two facts which were admitted there, and which seem to me to differentiate this case entirely from that of Adamson,² are, in the first place, that the man there was stooping over his work, and was therefore unable to avoid a danger from above; and in the second place, that other workmen who were in the same place, but who were not compelled to stoop, were able to avoid, and did in point of fact avoid, exactly the same danger which he failed to avoid. It was held by the First Division that the workman's special employment had appreciably increased the risk of accident of this particular kind; and upon that ground, although the Court thought it was a narrow case, they did not interfere with the decision at which the Sheriff had arrived. The present case is quite distinguishable from that of Adamson,² and we would be opening the door very wide—it has already been opened pretty wide in workmen's compensation cases—if we were to hold that because a man is employed in a particular place, therefore any accident which occurs to him in that place, because of the nature of its surroundings, is an accident arising out of his employment. I think that would be going a great way beyond any of the decided cases. I have therefore no difficulty in holding that we should sustain the appeal, and hold upon the facts stated that the Sheriff was not entitled to find in law that the accident to the respondent arose out of his employment.

LORD DUNDAS.—I do not entertain so clear and confident an opinion as

July 18, 1913. my brother, Lord Salvesen, about the way in which this case ought to be disposed of. I have had, and still have, some doubt about the matter, but Guthrie v. Kinghorn. I do not press it so far as to dissent from the conclusion proposed, in which Lord Dundas. I understand your Lordship and my brother, Lord Guthrie, concur. I confess I find it rather difficult to point to any really substantial or satisfactory distinction between this case and that of Adamson v. Anderson,¹ decided a few days ago in the other Division. Then, again, the Sheriff-substitute is, of course, the master of fact, and the question here is largely, though not entirely, one of fact. But your Lordships, as I understand, all consider that, upon the facts found, the arbitrator was not entitled in law to hold as he has done, and, having stated my doubt about the matter, I do not propose to say anything more.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I concur in the opinion expressed by Lord Salvesen. It is admitted that this unfortunate occurrence was an accident within the meaning of the Act. It is further admitted that what took place was in the course of the man's employment. Mr Chisholm submitted an argument under two heads to justify the Sheriff's finding that what took place arose out of the employment. He said, in the first place, that he did not need to show any special risk, but, if this were necessary, that the facts found disclosed a special risk. I think that, if anything is certain in this class of case, it is that, in order to justify an award such as we have here, there must have been some special risk to which the workman was exposed. Special risk may be one or other of three kinds. It may be owing to the nature of the employment at the time. All that can be said about that is that at the time the respondent was in charge of his employer's horse and lorry, and it was said that, consequently, he was not in a position to attend to his own safety in the same way as an ordinary passer-by would be able to do. I do not see, in relation to the kind of accident we have here, that the finding in fact justifies the inference which Mr Chisholm draws from it. In the case of Adamson v. Anderson,¹ it is noticeable that the First Division thought the case a narrow one, and that Lord Johnston was careful to put the judgment of the Court expressly on the two admissions which have been noticed by Lord Salvesen. Second, you may have special risk owing to the general nature of the man's employment, but in relation to the accident here there was no special risk due to his employment as a lorry-man. In the third place, you may have special risk arising from the place where the accident happened. We are told that the adjoining roof had blown off three or four times within the last few years, but it is not said that on these previous occasions any part that was blown off fell into the place where this man was injured. I therefore think, without questioning the judgment in Adamson v. Anderson,¹ that the question should be answered as Lord Salvesen proposes.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur in the judgment proposed. If I had had to decide a case with the same facts as those in Adamson v. Anderson,¹ before it had been dealt with by the other Division, I should have had the greatest possible difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the judgment of the July 18, 1913. Sheriff awarding compensation should be affirmed. Their Lordships of the First Division indicated plainly that they looked upon that case as a very narrow one, and I think we find in the opinion of Lord Johnston a circumstance referred to which distinguishes that case from the present. His Lordship says: "The fact that he (i.e., the workman) was engaged in the open air, bending over to adjust heavy machinery, is a fact from which it may reasonably be deduced that under the circumstances of his particular vocation he was exposed to something apparently beyond the normal risk, and that to this abnormal exposure the accident was attributable." Now, that seems to me to distinguish that case from the present. If a man is obliged to keep his eyes towards the ground while he is stooping to do something, he is in a totally different position from the driver of a van or lorry, whose business is to keep his eyes about him, not to stoop and look down. Accepting the view so clearly expressed by the Master of the Rolls in the case referred to by Lord Salvesen, I think it is not possible to hold in this case that there is ground for saying that the accident arose out of the employment. For these reasons I agree with your Lordships.

Lawrie's
Executor v.
Haig.

Succession—Mutual settlement—Contractual or testamentary—Revocation.

A husband and wife executed a mutual settlement in which each bequeathed to the other, on survival, the whole of his or her estate, for that other's liferent use and subject to certain burdens and directions which were identical in each case. In addition, the wife conveyed a heritable property to the husband in liferent and to certain of her own blood relations in fee. The settlement contained a clause reserving power of revocation by mutual consent during the joint lifetimes of the spouses, and declaring its finality unless so revoked, but reserving to the survivor a power of disposal over "all his or her own means and estate to be made and acquired after the decease of the first of us."

Held that the inference from the reservation of a power of disposal over estate acquired after the decease of the first of the spouses was that the provisions with regard to the estate conveyed by the mutual settlement were intended to be contractual; and, accordingly, that the wife was not, after the death of her husband, entitled to revoke the destination of the heritable property conveyed by her in that deed.

ON 22nd November 1913 a special case was presented to the Court for the determination of a question arising upon the construction of the mutual disposition and settlement of Alexander Sandilands, butcher, North Berwick, and Margaret Eeles or Sandilands, his wife, dated 6th June 1874.

The circumstances of the case appear fully from the following narrative, which is taken from the opinion of the Lord President:—

"Mr Sandilands, a butcher in North Berwick, executed a mutual

July 18, 1913. settlement with his wife by which he conveyed to her all the estate which should belong to him at the time of his death, and nominated her his executrix, but declared that the conveyance was to be under certain burdens which his wife was to be bound to implement and fulfil. These burdens were that she should herself only have the life-rent use and enjoyment of the estate, that she should pay certain specific legacies, and that, at her death, the entire residue of the estate should be paid to certain named persons. On the other hand, the wife conveyed her general estate to the husband in the same terms, imposing upon it the same burdens, textually repeated, as had been imposed by her husband upon his estate. But the conveyance by the wife differed from the conveyance by the husband in this particular that there was, in addition to the general conveyance, a special conveyance of a special subject, which was a tenement of land in North Berwick, and was conveyed in the following manner, viz. :—

Lawrie's
Executor v.
Haig.

" ' In favour of . . . my husband, in case he survive me, in life-rent, but for his life-rent use only, and of the said Mary Eeles or Haig and Elizabeth Eeles, daughters of the said late George Eeles, butcher, North Berwick, and their respective heirs and assignees whomsoever in fee,' the persons preferred to the fee being near relatives in blood of the lady herself.

" The settlement ended with this clause :— ' And we . . . reserve full power in our joint lifetimes, and of mutual assent and consent, but not otherwise, to alter or revoke these presents, but we severally and jointly expressly declare that, if not altered of joint consent, the same shall be final and conclusive on both of us, but reserving to the last survivor of us to dispose all his or her own means and estate to be made and acquired after the decease of the first of us, and power of disposal thereof as he or she may think fit.' "

" Mrs Sandilands survived her husband and lived for a period of thirty-five years after his death. She succeeded to a certain amount of property which her husband left behind him. On her death she left a holograph settlement, dated 10th March 1911, in which she disposed of her heritable property which she described as ' absolutely mine,' Nos. 45 and 47 High Street, North Berwick, to a person other than the parties named in the mutual settlement. This special case is brought to determine whether that property belongs to this donee or whether its disposal is ruled by the terms of the mutual settlement. There is no question as to the identity of Nos. 45 and 47 High Street as the parcel of ground described in the mutual settlement."

After the death of her first husband Mrs Sandilands married James Lawrie, a butcher in North Berwick, whom she also survived.

The parties to the case were (first) Mrs Lawrie's executor under her holograph settlement, (second) the representatives of Mary Eeles or Haig, one of the fiars named in the destination of the North Berwick property in the mutual settlement, and (third) Elizabeth Eeles or Brodie, the other fiar mentioned in that deed.

The contentions of the parties as set forth in the special case were as follows :—

" The first party maintains that the said Mrs Margaret Eeles or Sandilands or Lawrie in the circumstances before stated was entitled to revoke her mortis causa conveyance of the said subjects in the mutual disposition and settlement in favour of the said Mary Eeles or Haig and Elizabeth Eeles, and that she did effectually revoke the same by her said subsequent holograph settlement, and did thereby July 18, 1913.

validly convey the same in favour of the first party.

"The second and third parties, on the other hand, maintain that the said Mrs Margaret Eeles or Sandilands was not entitled after the death of her husband the said Alexander Sandilands, to alter or revoke the terms of the said mutual disposition and settlement, and that accordingly the second parties, as universal legatees and disponees of their said deceased mother, and the third party in her own right, are entitled to the fee of the said heritable subjects." Lawrie's Executor v.
Haig.

The questions of law were:—"1. Was Mrs Margaret Eeles or Sandilands entitled after the death of her husband, the said Alexander Sandilands, to alter or revoke the destination of the heritable subjects, Nos. 45 and 47 High Street, North Berwick, contained in the mutual disposition and settlement executed by her and her said husband on 6th June 1874; and was the alteration and revocation thereof contained in her holograph settlement of 10th March 1911 effectual? or 2. Does the destination of the said heritable subjects still fall to be regulated by the provisions of the said mutual disposition and settlement?"

The case was heard before the First Division (without Lord Johnston) on 18th July 1913.¹

LORD PRESIDENT.—[After the narrative quoted supra].—The general rules in regard to mutual settlements have been again and again laid down and are well settled. The main point is to discover whether a particular provision is contractual or is merely testamentary. There are certain general presumptions that can always be appealed to in determining this point. For example it is presumed that provisions in favour of the other party to the settlement are contractual; it is also presumed that provisions in favour of the issue of the marriage between the parties are contractual. On the other hand it is presumed that, where the objects of the testator's bounty are other than the parties to the deed or the children of the marriage between these parties, the provisions are testamentary. It is also presumed that persons want freedom with regard to the disposal of their own property, whatever may happen with regard to the property got from the other party. All these presumptions, however, must yield to indications in the deed that something else was intended. As is said by Lord McLaren in his book on Wills (vol. i., p. 423), and as I said in the case of the *United Free Church of Scotland v. Black*² everything turns on the instrument itself. Lord Kyllachy in the case of *Corrance's Trustees v. Glen*³ gave an instance of the class of clause from which it might be inferred that provisions in a mutual settlement—and not merely provisions in favour of the parties themselves, but also provisions as to the ultimate disposal of the estate—were contractual. It might be inferred, he said, "inter alia, from clauses restrictive of revocation, which are so expressed as to be unequivocally referable to the ultimate dispositions under the mutual deed." He was there, no doubt, dealing with the case of a person, who had received

July 18, 1913. nothing from the other party, disposing of his own property, but I think the statement applies equally in the case of a survivor to whom property has come from the predecessor. I am bound to say that I think that the particular clause in this deed leads necessarily to the conclusion that the provisions as to the ultimate destination of the property in the deed are contractual and not testamentary. I put no stress on the reservation of "full power in our joint lifetimes, and of mutual assent and consent, but not otherwise, to alter or revoke these presents," which is indeed pleonastic, and must be so unless you can go the length of holding that the deed created a jus quæsitum tertio, and no stress upon the phrase that "if not altered of joint consent the same shall be final and conclusive on both of us," which goes without saying. But the last clause seems to me to be conclusive, "Reserving to the last survivor of us to dispoñe all his or her own means and estate to be made and acquired after the decease of the first of us, and power of disposal thereof as he or she think fit." Now this power can only have been reserved because the parties were under the impression that without the reservation a disposition by the survivor of his own property acquired after the death of the other would have been struck at by the settlement. Accordingly, I think it is clear that in the view of these two people, the provisions in this settlement were contractual, and would have applied to everything but for this clause reserving power to dispose of what was to be acquired after the dissolution of the marriage. In these circumstances I think that the second parties are entitled to the property, and that the first question should be answered in the negative and the second in the affirmative.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I am of the same opinion. The question whether the provisions in favour of ultimate beneficiaries made by the spouses in this settlement are contractual is one which must be judged upon the terms of the deed itself, and to my mind there is an inference from the clause of reservation to the effect that the spouses intended to contract that the disposition of their means and estate to the ultimate beneficiaries should stand, except to the extent that there was the reservation that the last survivor was to have power "to dispoñe all his or her own means and estate to be made and acquired after the decease of the first of us and power of disposal thereof as he or she think fit." Now that can only refer to dispositions to the ultimate beneficiaries, and excludes the idea that the spouses had power to deal with the property which fell under the terms of the settlement.

THE COURT answered the first question in the negative, and the second in the affirmative.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), Second Schedule 17 (b)—Arbitration—Procedure—Proof—Appeal—Remit to arbitrator for further statement of fact—Power of arbitrator to hear further evidence. Park v. Coltness Iron Co., Limited.

In a case stated for appeal against the decision of a Sheriff-substitute acting as arbitrator in proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, in the course of which proceedings proof had been led, the Court remitted to the Sheriff-substitute to find whether the workman had given statutory notice of his accident as soon as practicable thereafter. The Sheriff-substitute reported that he had himself re-examined the doctor who attended the workman during his illness, and made a finding in answer to the question put by the Court. This report was objected to on the ground that it proceeded on evidence which had been taken after the proof had been closed. Held that the Sheriff-substitute was entitled under the remit to take further proof, and objection repelled.

Sheriff—Process—Proof—Summary cause—Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907 (7 Edw. VII. cap. 51), First Schedule—Rules of procedure regulating proof in ordinary Court—Application of rules to summary causes.

Opinion (per the Lord President) that the rules with regard to proof appended to the Sheriff Courts Act, 1907, are rules for regulating procedure in the ordinary Court and have no application to summary causes.

In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, in the Sheriff Court at Lanark, between Robert Park and the Coltness Iron Company, Limited, the Sheriff-substitute (Scott Moncrieff) refused to award compensation and, at the request of the workman, stated a case for appeal. 1st Division.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

The case, after setting forth certain facts as having been admitted or proved,* proceeded as follows:—"I found in law that the respondents had been prejudiced in their defence by the appellant's delay in giving notice of the accident, which delay was not occasioned by mistake or other reasonable cause, and accordingly refused the appellant's claim for compensation."

The questions of law were:—" (1) In the circumstances above

* The effect of the arbitrator's findings in fact was as follows:—

The workman received an injury on 12th November 1912, after which date he continued in his employment until 15th November, when he fell ill and was incapacitated until 6th January 1913. A doctor was called to attend him on 18th November and the doctor found him to be suffering from erysipelas, which, three days later, on 21st November, he was able to attribute to the injury. "That the appellant's condition shortly after ceasing work was such as to preclude him from personally attending to his affairs or giving notice of his accident." On 30th November the workman's father applied for and obtained a form of application for compensation, which was filled up and sent in to the employers on 2nd December. Upon that date, the earliest on which the employers could have examined the workman, it would have been impossible to say from such an examination that his condition was attributable to the accident. "That the appellant's delay in giving notice was not occasioned by mistake or other reasonable cause."

July 19, 1913. stated was there evidence upon which I was entitled to find that the respondents were prejudiced in their defence so as to bar the appellant from recovering compensation? (2) In the circumstances stated should I have refused compensation to the appellant? *

Park v. Coltness Iron Co., Limited.

After hearing counsel on 5th June 1913, the Court, on 10th June, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Remit to the Sheriff-substitute, as arbitrator, to find whether the statutory notice was given by the appellant as soon as practicable, and to report." *

On 11th July 1913 the Sheriff-substitute made a report in these terms:—

"Having reconsidered the case in respect of the remit to him . . . and having himself re-examined the doctor who attended the appellant during his illness, finds . . . that notice . . . must be held to have been as soon as practicable. The re-examination of the doctor was objected to by the agent for the respondents upon the following grounds:—(1) That there was no warrant for taking proof; (2) that proof had already been taken and closed; and (3) that the doctor's evidence had already been taken."

The appellant thereafter presented a note, in which he set forth the remit and report, and craved the Court to dispose of the case on the stated case and report.

The case was heard again before the First Division (without Lord Johnston) on 19th July 1913, when counsel for the respondents objected to the competency of the report.

Argued for the respondents;—The direction to the Sheriff-substitute in the remit was not to be construed as a direction or an authority to him to call for and hear fresh evidence. It was merely a direction to furnish an amplified statement of the facts established by the evidence already led. The effect of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, Second Schedule 17 (b),† read along with section

* The Lord President (who delivered the leading opinion), after examining the facts stated to have been proved, and considering the terms of section 2 of the Workmen's Compensation Act (referred to infra), pointed out that, though it was expressly found that the appellant's delay in giving notice of the accident was not occasioned by any "mistake or other reasonable cause," there was no finding as to whether notice of the accident had "been given as soon as practicable after the happening thereof," all in terms of the provisions of that section.

The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), enacts:—Sec. 2. "Proceedings for the recovery under this Act of compensation for an injury shall not be maintainable unless notice of the accident has been given as soon as practicable after the happening thereof and before the workman has voluntarily left the employment in which he was injured . . . Provided always that—(a) the want of or any defect or inaccuracy in such notice shall not be a bar to the maintenance of such proceedings if it is found in the proceedings for settling the claim that the employer is not . . . prejudiced in his defence by the want, defect, or inaccuracy . . . or that such want, defect, or inaccuracy was occasioned by mistake, absence from the United Kingdom, or other reasonable cause."

† The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), enacts:—Second Schedule, 17 (b). "Any application to the Sheriff as arbitrator shall be heard, tried, and determined summarily in the manner provided by section fifty-two of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1876 [now section 50 of the 1907 Act, infra] . . . subject to the declaration that it shall be competent to either party within the time and in accordance 50 of the Sheriff Courts Act, 1907,* was to subject proceedings under July 19, 1913. the former Act to the rules of procedure governing summary applications in the Sheriff Court, including the rules of the First Schedule to the Sheriff Courts Act. The Sheriff-substitute as arbitrator in these proceedings had no authority to depart from the rules, in particular rule 75, of the latter Schedule, or from the general rule of practice governing the closing of proofs.

Park v. Coltness Iron Co., Limited.

Counsel for the appellant were not called on.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case I need not repeat what was said at the former advising, when we remitted to the Sheriff-substitute to find whether the notice was given by the appellant as soon as practicable and to report. The learned Sheriff, in order to qualify himself to give that report, thought it necessary to re-examine the doctor, and it has been argued to us to-day that that vitiates the report, upon the ground that the proof being closed the Sheriff had no power to hear any further proof, in respect of certain rules appended to the Sheriff Courts Act, 1907. It is true that paragraph (17) (b) of the Second Schedule to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, provides that "any application to the Sheriff as arbitrator shall be heard, tried, and determined summarily in the manner provided by section 52 of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act 1876." It is also true that section 50 of the Sheriff Courts Act, 1907, which deals with summary applications, is substituted for section 52 of the Act of 1876, and that arbitrations under the Workmen's Compensation Act are accordingly to be dealt with in the same way as summary applications in the Sheriff Court. I think, however, the objection fails for two reasons, either of which would be sufficient for the disposal of the case. In the first place, I think it is perfectly clear that the rules with regard to proof appended to the Sheriff Courts Act are rules for regulating procedure in the ordinary Court, and have no application to summary causes, in which no procedure is prescribed and in which the Sheriff is to order such procedure as he thinks requisite. Accordingly these rules have no application to arbitrations under the Workmen's Compensation Act, which under paragraph (17) (b) of the Second Schedule to that Act fall to be treated as summary causes.

There is another reason why this objection is bad. The appeal which is with the conditions prescribed by Act of Sederunt, to require the Sheriff to state a case on any question of law determined by him, and his decision thereon in such case may be submitted to either Division of the Court of Session; who may hear and determine the same, and remit to the Sheriff with instruction as to the judgment to be pronounced. . . ."

* The Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907 (7 Edw. VII. cap. 51), enacts:—Sec. 50. "In summary applications (where a hearing is necessary) the Sheriff shall appoint the application to be heard at a diet to be fixed by him, and at that or any subsequent diet (without record of evidence unless the Sheriff shall order a record) shall summarily dispose of the matter and give his judgment in writing: Provided that wherever in any Act of Parliament an application is directed to be heard, tried, and determined summarily or in the manner provided by section fifty-two of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1876, such direction shall be read and construed as if it referred to this section of this Act: Provided also that nothing contained in this Act shall affect any right of appeal provided by any Act of Parliament under which a summary application is brought."

July 19, 1913. taken here is specifically given by paragraph (17) (b) of the Second Schedule to the Workmen's Compensation Act, which allows parties to appeal by way of stated case. Under section 17 (g) of the Act of Sederunt of 26th June 1907,¹ this Court has power to send back the case to the Sheriff for amend-

Ld. President. ment. I am clearly of opinion that that power of remitting includes a power of remitting to the Sheriff to do anything he thinks necessary, and as a matter of fact we have again and again remitted to the Sheriff to take further proof. It is quite true that in this case we did not say in so many words that the Sheriff was to take further proof, but I think he correctly interpreted the spirit of the remit, and I think it would be quite futile to hold that his report is vitiated because he has taken such additional proof as he deemed necessary for the determination of the matter remitted to him.

Upon the merits the learned Sheriff has returned an answer which enables us to deal with the whole of the case, and our judgment will be that the second question of law should be answered in the negative and the case remitted to the learned Sheriff to find the compensation which he thinks due.

LORD KINNAR and LORD MACKENZIE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—" . . . Having resumed consideration of the stated case, and also considered the finding by the Sheriff-substitute as arbitrator, . . . and having heard counsel for the respondents, answer the second question stated in the negative, recall the determination of the Sheriff-substitute as arbitrator, and remit to him to award compensation, and proceed as accords. . . ."

Railway—Railway and Canal Commissioners—Arbitration—Ascertainment of quantum meruit under a contract—Competency—Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1873 (36 and 37 Vict. cap. 48), sec. 8.

For the purpose of authorising them to construct a railway, the promoters of the Newburgh and North Fife Railway Company obtained an Act of Parliament, which incorporated the Companies Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, the Companies Clauses Act, 1863, and Acts amending the same. A Schedule to the Act contained an agreement between the Company and the North British Railway Company, whereby the North British Company guaranteed a fixed dividend upon "the paid-up share capital" of the Newburgh Company. The Newburgh Company, having failed to obtain sufficient subscriptions to their shares, entered into an agreement with a Syndicate, whereby the Company undertook to issue to the Syndicate their whole unissued capital, and the Syndicate undertook to construct the railway. It was established by proof that the cost of construction was about 60 per cent of the face value of the capital issued to the Syndicate, and that the Syndicate disposed of the shares so issued at less than par.

Held (rev. judgment of the Railway and Canal Commissioners), by a majority of seven Judges (diss. the Lord President, Lord Kinnear, and Lord Dundas), that the capital so issued to the Syndicate was not "paid-up share capital" of the Newburgh Company in the sense of the agreement with the North British Company, and that the North British Company were only bound to contribute to the dividend on so much of the capital of the Newburgh Company as was issued in consideration of cash or the equivalent of cash.

Further held (diss. Lord Johnston) that it was competent for the Railway and Canal Commissioners, sitting as arbiters, to determine what amount of the capital was issued in consideration of cash or the equivalent of cash.

Opinions (per Lord Johnston, Lord Salvesen, and Lord Skerrington) that a company incorporated under the Companies Clauses Acts is not entitled to issue its original shares at a discount: Question whether such a company is entitled to issue shares for a consideration other than cash or the equivalent of cash.

(SEE previous report—1911 S. C. 710.)

On 19th January 1910 the Newburgh and North Fife Railway Company presented an application to the Court of the Railway and Canal Commissioners, coming in place of arbiters, for the determination of several differences which had arisen out of an agreement between them and the North British Railway Company, and claimed, inter alia, that the applicants' "paid-up share capital," upon which the defendants were bound to contribute towards a fixed dividend, amounted to £180,000.

The agreement scheduled to the Act, and by section 42 made binding upon the North British Railway Company (the first parties) and the Newburgh Company (the second parties), provided, inter alia, (Article First) that in the event of an Act being obtained, and the capital being subscribed, the second parties should construct the railway, which (Article Second) the first parties should thereafter maintain and work in perpetuity. It was further provided (Article Fourth) that the first parties should collect the gross revenues of the railway, and should be entitled to retain 50 per cent thereof as remuneration for maintaining and working the railway, and should pay over the balance of 50 per cent to the second parties. (Article Seventh) "If the nett revenue accruing to the second parties is not sufficient to pay a dividend of four per centum per annum on the paid-up share capital of the second parties then the first parties shall out of fifty per centum of the mileage proportion of receipts accruing to them on their own railway from traffic including mails passing over their system or any part thereof to or from any place on the railway contribute such sum as may be necessary to make up that dividend so far as the said fifty per centum of mileage receipts accruing in each half year to the first parties shall suffice to pay such deficiency." (Article Eighth) "Should the sum to be contributed under the immediately preceding article along with the said nett revenue of the second parties not be sufficient to pay a dividend of four per centum per annum on the paid-up share capital of the second parties then the first parties shall out of twenty-five per centum of the mileage receipts accruing to them on their own railway from traffic including mails passing over their system or any part thereof and over the railway contribute such further sum as may be necessary to make up the said dividend of four per centum per annum so far as the said twenty-five per centum of mileage receipts accruing in each half year to the first parties shall suffice to pay such deficiency." The Newburgh Company failed to raise any capital beyond the directors' qualifying shares, which amounted to £1500, and with the knowledge of the North British Railway Company they applied for and obtained from Parliament three extensions of time.

Co. v. North
British Rail-

Eventually in the year 1905 the Company entered into negotiations with the financial house of Arbuthnot, Latham, & Company, who undertook to form a syndicate for the construction of the railway. In order that a valid meeting of the shareholders of the Company might be held, the directors of Arbuthnot, Latham, & Company subscribed for and were allotted shares to the amount of £9100, which sum was paid in cash, but a rebate of 40 per cent was subsequently given to these shareholders.

On 31st May 1906 an agreement was entered into between the Company and the Syndicate formed by Arbuthnot, Latham, & Company under the name of The Engineering Electric and Construction Syndicate, Limited (therein called "the contractors"). The agreement contained, inter alia, the clauses printed in the footnote infra.*

* "(1) The contractors shall construct and complete fit for traffic as a single line of railway but with land and bridges for a double line to the satisfaction of the Company's engineer and so as to comply in all respects with the said Acts and the said agreement between the Company and the North British Company the railway [and other works] specified in Article 1 of the said agreement with the North British Company. (3) The contractors shall pay for all land provided for the construction of the works and all compensation payable to the landowners and others in respect of land required for temporary purposes or of property injuriously affected and shall execute all accommodation works which the Company may be called upon or may agree to execute and shall provide the sum of £4400 for meeting the cost of administering the affairs of the Company during construction of which £3300 shall be paid as required during construction and the balance shall be paid on the works being completed and taken over by the North British Company for the purpose of working. Any lands which shall be acquired and shall be superfluous shall be deemed to belong to the contractors and shall at their request be sold by the Company for the contractors' benefit on terms and conditions approved by the contractors and the net proceeds shall be handed over to the contractors. (4) The contractors will provide for or satisfy all legal costs and charges including all costs payable by agreement or under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act to landowners . . . and also all other legal and Parliamentary costs charges and expenses and all engineers' and surveyors' and valuers' fees and charges which the Company may now be liable for or may incur with the approval of the contractors. . . . (5) The Company shall at the request and cost of the contractors give all notices and take all steps necessary for obtaining possession of or acquiring any land required for the purposes of the works and for having the amounts of all purchase-money and compensation in respect thereof settled but all money (if any) required to be paid into Court for the purpose of obtaining possession of land shall be provided by the contractors. (6) In consideration of the construction of the works and of the payments and expenses to be made and borne by the contractors under this contract the Company shall pay to the contractors in the manner hereinafter mentioned the sum of £240,000 of which £109,400 shall be paid in ordinary shares of the Company £60,000 in preference shares and £60,000 in 4 per cent debenture stock of the Company (which shall bear interest as from the taking over of the works by the North British Company for the purpose of

and North

Co. v. North British Railway Co.

The application, which included other matters, was heard by the Railway and Canal Commissioners between 28th November and 6th December 1911, and judgment was delivered on 27th January 1912.*

* LORD MACKENZIE'S opinion contained the following passages :—Paid-up Capital.—Under the dividend guarantee clauses the obligation of the North British Company is to make up to the extent specified in articles 7 and 8, if necessary, a sum sufficient to pay a dividend of 4 per cent on the paid-up share capital of the Newburgh and North Fife Railway Company. . . . The argument for the North British Company was that the agreement of 31st May 1906 between the Newburgh Company and the Syndicate, under which the latter agreed to construct the line, and the former agreed in consideration thereof to issue their capital to the Syndicate, was ultra vires. It is not suggested that there was any fraud or misrepresentation. It is said to be ultra vires because (1) under it there was a delegation of the duties of the directors and of the Company; (2) it provided for the issue of share capital otherwise than for payment in cash; (3) it provided for the issue of shares at a discount; and (4) the capital was not applied to the purposes which the Act authorises. In my opinion all these grounds of attack fail. The position of the Company in 1906 has to be considered. Their Act had been obtained in 1897, and they had on three different occasions obtained an extension of time for the exercise of their powers. They had failed to raise their capital, and accordingly entered into the agreement with the Syndicate by which they got the line made. It is said that the Syndicate agreement is not a construction contract. [His Lordship quoted articles 1 and 6 of the agreement.] I agree with the passage in Mr Dempster's evidence where he says "the contract which we entered into then was a wise contract and fully justified from a business point of view." The Newburgh Company made the agreement in bona fide. Before entering into it estimates had been obtained, and the calculations made are fully detailed in the evidence of Mr Dempster and Mr Beer, into which I do not propose to go in detail. It is sufficient to say that in my opinion they amount to this, that the Syndicate underwrote the construction of the line on the basis approximately of a 10 per cent profit, with a possibility of about the same amount more if none of the sum estimated for contingencies was required. In consideration of the issue of the whole capital to them the Syndicate took upon themselves the obligations and risk of the construction of the line. The profit was not, in these circumstances, excessive. It was argued that the Syndicate, before they made the agreement with the Newburgh Company, had an offer for the construction of the line at a figure considerably under that which appears in the estimates obtained by the Newburgh Company. There is no sufficient evidence to connect the Newburgh Company with this. With regard to the point that the total capital was fixed on the basis of a double line being constructed, whereas only a single line with land and bridges for a double line was made, the evidence shows that there was a rise in the cost of construction between the date of the Act and 1906. So far as the facts are concerned, therefore, my opinion is against the contention of the North British Company, as set out in their pleadings and maintained at the bar,

An order was pronounced on 21st March 1912 to the effect, inter alia, "that according to the true construction of articles 7 and 8 of the said agreement [i.e., the agreement contained in the schedule to the Newburgh and North Fife Railway Act, 1897] . . . the amount of the paid-up share capital of the applicants, towards payment of dividend on which the defendants are bound to contribute, is £180,000, making with a debenture issue of £60,000 a total of £240,000."

Newburgh
and North
Fife Railway
Co. v. North
British Railway Co.

The defendants, the North British Railway Company, appealed to the Court of Session, and the case was heard by the First Division, consisting of the Lord President, Lord Johnston, and Lord Skerrington, on 5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th November 1912. Thereafter a rehearing was ordered before a Court of Seven Judges, and the case was reargued on 4th, 5th, and 6th March 1913 before the Lord President, Lord that the agreement of 31st May 1906 was not a genuine or bona fide construction contract.

It is, however, said that the agreement is contrary to law. The basis of the argument was that the Newburgh Company had done what was equivalent to issuing their shares at a discount. This argument is based on the view that it would have been illegal for them to do so. It is to be observed, however, that the Newburgh and North Fife Railway is a company formed under the Companies Clauses Act, and is not a company under the Companies Act of 1862. So far as the decisions have gone, they are adverse to the defendants' contention that it is illegal for a company formed under the Companies Clauses Act to issue their shares at a discount. I may refer to the opinion of Lord Shand in the case of Klenck v. The East India Company for Exploring and Mining, Limited, 16 R. 371, at p. 280; the judgment of Romer, J., in the case of Statham v. Brighton Marine Palace and Pier Company, [1899] 1 Ch. 199 (this is a decision directly on the question), and the case of Webb v. Shropshire Railways Company, [1893] 3 Ch. 307 (the decision in this case, however, turned upon the terms of the special Act). It is not necessary to determine whether it was illegal for the Newburgh Company to issue their shares at a discount or not. They did not in fact issue their shares at a discount. They received full value for the share capital which they issued. It has long been recognised as regards companies under the Companies Acts that shares can be issued against money's worth. As Lord Watson points out in the Ooregum case, [1892] A. C., at p. 137, it has been ruled that so long as the company honestly regards the consideration given as fairly representing the nominal value of the shares in cash, its estimate ought not to be critically examined. The effect of the judgment in in re Wragg, Limited, [1897] 1 Ch. 796, is that the Court will not inquire into the value of the consideration unless the agreement under which the shares were issued is impeached for fraud or misrepresentation, the question of value being one to be decided between the parties themselves. This law is no less applicable in the case of a company under the Companies Clauses Act than it is in the case of a company under the Companies Acts. When it is applied to the present dispute, in which there is no suggestion of fraud or misrepresentation, a decision against the defendants upon the facts really concludes the case against them. The argument against the validity of the Syndicate agreement which was founded upon an examination of its terms in my opinion fails. If sound against the Syndicate, it would be equally sound against a contract made with any firm of contractors for the construction of a line.

It was further contended that even assuming the Syndicate contract to be ex facie valid, yet the money had been misapplied by being spent on purposes which were not authorised by the statute. I understood that the case to which the greatest weight was attached on this point was the Great

Argued for the appellants;—In the scheduled agreement the appellants' obligation to contribute towards the dividend was subject to the conditions that the capital of the Newburgh Company should be subscribed, and that the Company themselves should construct the railway. The capital had not been "subscribed" or "paid-up." The word "subscribed" was to be read in its ordinary sense as "paid in cash," and had been so interpreted in a case¹ under section 16 of the Lands Clauses Act,² a section intended primarily for the protection of land-owners. Allotment was not equivalent to subscription,³ although in a question between a company and its creditors subscription might mean "obligation to subscribe."⁴ As the condition that the capital should be subscribed had not been fulfilled, the appellants were freed from their whole obligation to contribute towards the dividend, and North-West Central Railway Company v. Charlebois, [1899] A. C. 114. In that case a contract was held ultra vires on the ground that certain benefits which were really of a gratuitous nature were given. There is nothing of a similar character under the Syndicate agreement in question here. Great stress was laid upon the document No. 168, which is a statement of the income and expenditure of the Engineering and Electric Construction Syndicate, Limited, from 30th May 1906 to 17th November 1911, under the heading of the Newburgh and North Fife Railway Contract—[Printed supra, p. 1171]. This, however, is a document with which the Newburgh Company had no concern. It relates to the affairs of the Syndicate. What the Syndicate did with the shares after they got them—whether they dealt with them in blocks, as was the case here, or disposed of them in any other manner they considered most advantageous for themselves, either at a profit, or, as was to be anticipated here, at a loss, does not affect the validity of the bargain made by the Newburgh Company.

My conclusion therefore is that the whole capital of the Newburgh Company is fully paid up within the meaning of the scheduled agreement. This answers in terms, what, according to the opinions expressed by the First Division on 22nd February 1911 [1911 S. C. 710], is within the reference.

MR GATHORNE HARDY concurred.

SIR JAMES WOODHOUSE.— . . . With regard to the third obligation, whereby the North British Company guarantees the dividend on the paid-up capital, I am quite unable to follow Mr Cooper in the long argument which he addressed to us, with a view to establishing that the defendants were under no legal liability to make up the deficiency in the revenue under articles 7 and 8 of the agreement. I see no ground for his contention that the applicants exceeded their statutory powers in entering into the agreement of the 31st May 1906 with the Construction Syndicate, neither do I think there is any rational basis in fact for his allegation that the applicants neither the Railway Commissioners nor the Court could reform the contract. Moreover, the Newburgh Company had acted ultra vires—first, in delegating their powers to the Syndicate and, second, in issuing their shares for a consideration other than money or money's worth. (1) Parliament had committed to the Company the duty of constructing the railway, and what required statutory powers could not be delegated.¹ The Company could employ contractors, but the Syndicate, as appeared from the 1906 agreement, occupied a higher position than that of a contractor. They undertook the whole duties and liabilities of the Company except the ministerial work of serving notices on the landowners and issuing scrip. They could even dictate the times at which scrip should be issued. The delegation of statutory duties was contrary to public policy.² Where a company was created for a public purpose, either under the Companies Acts or by Act of Parliament, whatever was not permitted nor fairly incidental to its powers must be held to be prohibited.³ The agreement with the Syndicate was therefore null ab initio, and the appellants, even if they had known of it, could not have homologated it.⁴ (2) The Newburgh Company were acting ultra vires in handing over their capital to the Syndicate on a slump contract without any relation to the actual expenditure. The capital represented more than the sums which were spent in acquiring the land and constructing the line, and the surplus was spent on unauthorised purposes, and was therefore an illegal bonus.⁵ Admitted acted throughout in an illegal or irregular manner, so as to relieve the defendants from their liability.

It is important to note that the defendants not only carefully abstained from making, but wholly disclaimed any imputation of fraud, misrepresentation, or bad faith against the applicants. I have most carefully considered the proofs and documents in process, and I fail to find in the facts and circumstances in evidence before us the shadow of a case to support the contentions put forward by Mr Cooper. I think the transactions between the Newburgh Company and the Syndicate are characterised by the utmost good faith and fair dealing, and are within the powers of their Act. My Lord has in his opinion dealt fully with the cases that were discussed before us, and I desire respectfully to express my entire concurrence in the conclusions at which he has arrived.

that the face value of the shares could not be realised, and that the Company were in fact buying the Syndicate's credit, still that was not one of the objects contemplated by the Company's Act of Parliament.¹ The Act, particularly sections 6, 8, 9, and 11, contemplated the issue of shares for cash and for nothing else, and there was no authority for the proposition that companies incorporated under the Companies Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845,² could issue their original shares for anything but money or money's worth. In section 8* the words "shall otherwise have become entitled" referred to the acquisition of shares by transfer, marriage, inheritance, or bankruptcy, and did not refer to purchase otherwise than in cash. Companies registered under the Companies Acts could issue their shares for money's worth, but that was in virtue of section 25 of the Companies Act, 1862,³ re-enacted in section 25 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908.⁴ Even in the case of these companies the money's worth must be of genuine present value, not a mere promise to give goods.⁵ In the present case the shares were not even issued for money's worth, but were issued at a discount. In so issuing them the Company were acting ultra vires. Section 21 of the Companies Clauses Act, 1863,⁶ gave power to a Company to issue new shares on such terms and conditions as the directors might think advantageous, "but so that not less than the full nominal amount of any share or portion of stock be payable or paid in respect thereof." The words quoted were repealed with regard to railway companies by section 27 of the Railway Companies (Scotland) Act, 1867,⁷ and with regard to other companies under the Companies Clauses Act, by section 5 of the Companies Clauses Act (1863) Amendment Act, 1869⁸; but these sections applied only to the issue of new shares, and there was no authority apart from the case of *Statham*⁹ for a company issuing their original shares at a discount. This applied equally to companies under the Companies Acts and those under the Companies Clauses Acts, the principle being that the public were to be assured that the capital, so far as not spent on authorised objects, remained undiminished.¹⁰ Section 89 of the Companies (Consolida-

Newburgh
and North
Fife Railway
Co. v. North
British Rail-

Argued for the respondents;—The appellants were working the line under their agreement with the respondents, and accordingly they were not entitled to have it reduced altogether. The appellants knew that the capital could not be raised, they knew of the agreement with the Syndicate, and were themselves sub-contractors under it; they were accordingly barred from maintaining the plea of ultra vires. It might be open to a shareholder of the Newburgh Company to complain of the particular terms of the agreement, but the appellants, as a third party, could only object to the result on the ground that money had been spent outside the undertaking. The Commissioners, who were final on questions of fact, had held, as appeared from the opinions, that the agreement was fair and honest and that the Newburgh Company got full value for their shares. The consideration was not merely the construction of the line; it included a guarantee of indemnity against claims, and also the cost of getting the shares underwritten. It was permissible for a company to have recourse to a financial house and to pay brokerage if necessary⁷; and in fact the shares of railway companies were usually underwritten. It made no difference that the financial house was also the contractor. Contractors' lines such as this had received judicial cognisance.⁸ The agreement with the Syndicate did not amount to delegation. The Newburgh Act did not direct the method of construction, and what was not prohibited was permitted. The authorities cited by the appellants on this point, except *Howard's case*⁹ (which was a delegation by directors of their power to allot shares), were cases where the Court held that the contract amounted to a sale or lease of the undertaking. Here there was neither sale nor lease, but a construction contract, and as soon as the construction was finished the Newburgh directors resumed their powers. It was immaterial that the price was a slump sum payable by instalments. The Company were entitled under the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845,¹⁰ to acquire land by agreement, and the Syndicate under their agreement with the Company might get it cheaper than the directors could. *Eastern Railway Company*¹ as to delegation was made in the course of the argument and had no authority. The expression "paid-up capital" meant primarily capital upon which there were no unpaid calls,² and payment need not necessarily be made in cash, it might be in services rendered,³ or it might be credited by way of set-off.⁴ This was the natural meaning of the words "shall otherwise become entitled to a share" in section 8 of the Companies Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845.⁵ The cases cited by the appellants on this point were inapplicable. *Arnison's case*⁶ was one of false representation; *Lord Shrewsbury's case*⁷ was one of devoting capital to paying an illegal bonus, as also was Charlebois's case.⁸ *Mason's case*⁹ and *Mann's case*¹⁰ dealt with illegal payment of promotion expenses, and in *Mann's case*¹⁰ there was also breach of a fiduciary duty. The shares in the present case were in fact issued for money or money's worth, but it was not ultra vires to issue shares, original as well as new shares, at a discount, if no better price could be got.¹¹ The Companies Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845,¹² made no distinction in the issue of original and new shares. The prohibition in section 21 of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1863,¹³ against issuing new shares at a discount (afterwards repealed by section 27 of the Railway Companies (Scotland) Act, 1867¹⁴), left the law as to the issue of original shares as it was, and the prohibition in the Act of 1863 would not have been necessary unless it had been previously possible to issue shares at a discount.

At advising on 17th July 1913,—

LORD JOHNSTON.—Under the reference contained in article 14 of the agreement between the North British Railway Company and the promoters of the Newburgh and North Fife Railway Company, which was scheduled to the Act of the latter Company passed in 1897, and by its 42nd section confirmed and made binding on the Company, two main questions were submitted by the parties to the Railway Commissioners—the first, which embraced a large number of matters of detail, was, speaking generally, whether the North British Company, in fulfilling the obligations undertaken by them to work the North Fife Company's line, were developing the traffic of the line in the spirit of the agreement; the second related to a July 17, 1913. "difference as to the amount of the paid-up share capital" of the North Fife Company towards the payment of the dividend on which the North British Company were bound to contribute.

Newburgh
and North
Fife Railway
Co. v. North
British Railway Co.

The Newburgh Company maintained that the amount was £180,000, being the whole authorised share capital of the Company, which they contended was issued and paid up.

Ld. Johnston.

The North British Company, admitting that the question of their liability or non-liability to do so was matter of arbitration under the scheduled agreement, and therefore within the jurisdiction of the Commissioners to decide, maintained that in the circumstances, and for the reasons advanced by them, they were under no liability to contribute towards payment of dividend on the whole share capital of the Newburgh Company. But they further maintained that, if they were not so liable, it was not within the jurisdiction of the Commissioners to determine whether they were liable to contribute any sum to make up any dividend on a smaller amount of the share capital of the Newburgh Company, or to fix and determine any capital of the Newburgh Company towards payment of the dividend on which they were bound to contribute. The second question therefore involved the determination of the meaning and effect of the undertaking of the North British Company to supplement, if necessary, the sources of revenue for payment of a stated dividend on the "paid-up share capital" of the North Fife Company.

The first question is not within the appeal to us. That appeal is entirely limited to the second question. In order to understand it, it is only necessary to say that the North British Company, by the agreement above referred to, undertook to work the North Fife line for 50 per cent of the gross revenue of the North Fife Company, as gross revenue is defined in article 4 of the agreement, and to hand over the balance of 50 per cent to or for behoof of the North Fife Company. Out of their 50 per cent the North Fife Company were to pay (article 5) sundry items, including interest on debenture stock and other borrowed money. The balance of their 50 per cent is the "net revenue" of the Company. And (article 7) "If the net revenue" accruing to "the North Fife Company is not sufficient to pay a dividend of 4 per centum per annum on the paid-up share capital" of the Company, the North British Company are to contribute pro tanto what is necessary to make up the deficiency, out of two sources of revenue. These are defined (articles 7 and 8), and without going into details I may say that they are both derived directly or indirectly from traffic originating in or passing over the North Fife line. This is not a guarantee of a 4 per cent dividend pure and simple. Its value is contingent, depending on actual traffic. But it was regarded by those concerned, on the advice of experts, as practically amounting to a 4 per cent guarantee, and was, I think, so intrinsically of the nature of a guarantee, that it must be judged of on the same footing as if it was an absolute guarantee, that is with strictness. It was an obligation to contribute towards dividends on the North Fife stock out of funds which, if not called upon, would remain in the coffers of the North British Company, and be available for its purposes. And I cannot distinguish in its essence between July 17, 1918. such an obligation and a proper guarantee. I desire to emphasise this because the consideration goes deeply into the question before this Court and appears to me to have been overlooked by the Commissioners.

Newburgh
and North
Fife Railway
Co. v. North
British Railway Co.

Ld. Johnston.

Such being the obligation of the North British Company, the real question at issue is, what is "paid-up capital," not merely per se, but in the sense of the agreement? Is it, as maintained by the North British Company, capital subscribed and paid up in the ordinary sense of these terms: is it, in fact, capital raised on a cash basis? Or is it, as maintained by the North Fife Company, capital not subscribed for, not paid up, but raised by being issued in block to an intermediary in consideration of his undertaking the risks and obligations of the promoters and of the Company in obtaining the Act and in getting the line completed, with right to the intermediary to place the capital on the market on such terms as he pleased, and making a profit or suffering a loss accordingly—in other words, capital raised on a basis other than cash?

When the case was first before the Judges of the First Division, I came without difficulty to the conclusion that, on a consideration merely of the terms of the contract, the contention of the North British Company was sound, and that the Commissioners had come to a wrong conclusion. A further discussion of the case, and a more close examination of the history and nature of the transaction by which the capital of the North Fife Company came to be issued or raised, has not only confirmed my first view, but it has also impressed me with the importance of the question at issue, and the dangerous consequences which may ensue if the contentions by which the North Fife Company have supported their case are to receive the imprimatur of the Railway Commissioners and of this Court.

It is necessary, therefore, before considering the documents on which I think the question depends, first to state, as clearly as possible, how the nominal capital of the North Fife Company was raised.

The project of the North Fife promoters was a line from St Fort to Newburgh, to link the North British Tay Bridge route with their original line from Ladybank to Perth, via Newburgh. The promoters were no doubt locally interested, but they were counting on the competition between the North British and the Caledonian. They regarded their line as of importance to the North British in this competition. It was, at the time, to a certain extent so regarded by the North British Company. Hence the agreement which we have to construe. It was made, and the North Fife Act passed in 1897. But even with the quasi guarantee of the North British, the promoters failed to get anyone with capital to look at their shares. I do not think the North British Company, after the North Fife Act was got, were particularly anxious on the subject of the construction of the line, for, though they looked benevolently on the promoters, and gave their concurrence to several extensions of time being obtained, they made no objection that the line was still not commenced in 1906. In that year the solicitor for the promoters, who one can see was really the soul of the promotion, came into touch with a firm of Arbutnot, Latham, & Company, a financial house in London—they are described as "an accepting house"—and therefrom sprang a further agreement under which the North Fife line was ultimately made.

I am of opinion, contrary I think to some of the Commissioners, and I July 17, 1913.
 am inclined to think also to some of your Lordships, that we are bound to look behind this agreement which came to be made between the North and North Fife Company and Messrs Arbuthnot, Latham, & Company. It may be Newburgh that, having entered into a pooling arrangement with the Caledonian in the Fife Railway end of 1907, the North British have ceased to have any interest in the Co. v. North North Fife line, and that, since it was opened in 1908-9, the North British British Rail-Company have fallen very far short of acting in the spirit of their under- way Co.
 taking of 1897, and have starved instead of developing the traffic of the Ld. Johnston.
 North Fife line. But as they are bound to develop the traffic within the spirit of the agreement, so the North Fife Company were bound to issue their capital within the terms of the agreement, if they are to exact the contribution in guarantee of their dividend.

What then was the position created in 1906 by the agreement between the North Fife Company and Messrs Arbuthnot, Latham, & Company?
 By that time the promoters had become hopeless of raising capital themselves. They had failed to interest any other capitalists. Accordingly, they then entered into an agreement with Arbuthnot, Latham, & Company (under the guise of the Engineering Electric and Construction Syndicate, Limited), the true meaning and effect of which was—We hand you over our whole share capital and all our powers under our Act, and you undertake to construct and complete our line.

It was well known, and was the basis of the agreement, that Arbuthnot, Latham, & Company were a financial firm. But they were of good standing, and the promoters of the North Fife line took steps to satisfy themselves that they were financially able to carry out what they undertook.
 Still, in fact, what the North Fife promoters bought or acquired, under the contract of 1906, was Arbuthnot, Latham, & Company's credit, and of course they paid for it. I do not like to say that they sold their Act to Arbuthnot, Latham, & Company, because in the expression there is an invidious imputation of personal interest. And I should wish to say, with Sir James Woodhouse, that "the transactions between the Newburgh Company and the Syndicate are characterised by the utmost good faith and fair dealing," though I must qualify that statement by the addition of the words inter se, and though I cannot follow his lead when he says farther, "and are within the powers of their Act." Were it necessary for my judgment
 I should be prepared to hold that they were not within their powers under their Act. But it is not in my opinion so much a question of their powers under their Act, as of what was in the contemplation of their agreement with the North British Company. It is here that I find myself obliged to part company with the Commissioners. They have, I think, mistaken the issue.
 What the North Fife Company did was not, in my opinion, within the contemplation of that agreement. In point of fact what the promoters did, though I do not use the expression invidiously, was in effect to sell or assign their Act, for they put Messrs Arbuthnot, Latham, & Company precisely in their position under the Act, though they coupled this with an obligation on their vendees or assignees to complete the line. Now Arbuthnot, Latham, & Company, though nominally the contractors, never intended to construct the line themselves. They were to employ proper constructional contractors, and in point of fact had in their pockets an offer to execute the work from the contractors who ultimately undertook it. And they were placed in command of the whole share and debenture capital of the Company, subject to its being doled out to them proportionally to the progress of the work. It was on their ability first to contract on cash terms for the construction of the line, and second to place, at least on terms, the share capital of the Company with their clientele, that they relied for their profit. They had the credit and the connection which gave them that ability. The promoters had neither. Hence I think it absolutely true that what the promoters acquired was the credit of Arbuthnot, Latham, & Company, and with it, if it proved as good as they were advised, the completion of their line, and that what Arbuthnot, Latham, & Company acquired in return was the whole capital of the Company under the Act, to make the best they could of—and their profit depended on the one hand on the terms of the cash contract they were able to make for the construction of the line, and on the other on the terms on which they were able to place the Company's capital on the market. As to both they had a perfectly free hand. When the true meaning and effect of the agreement between the North Fife Company and Messrs Arbuthnot, Latham, & Company is grasped, three conclusions, I think, unquestionably follow:—1st, that the issue of capital thereby effected was not an issue directly sanctioned by the general or special Acts applicable; 2nd, that it cannot be supported as an issue of capital in consideration of value in kind, on the principle accepted in cases under the Registered Companies Acts, even assuming that principle applicable; and 3rd, that it cannot possibly be represented as such an issue as was contemplated by the North British Railway Company and the North Fife Company, when they entered into the agreement under construction.

The promoters, no doubt, thought that they had done a good stroke of business in enlisting Arbuthnot, Latham, & Company to do what they were quite unable to do themselves, viz., make their Act march. They seem to have thought that they had obtained an Act to enable them to make a line of railway; that their business was to make it; that they were taking the only way which, in their circumstances of credit and with the line's prospects, was open to them to attain that end; that in the result the railway was made, completed, and opened, and that there the matter ends. I cannot help thinking that this was very much the view of the Commissioners. But irrespective of whether this course of dealing was within the Company's powers under their Act, it must be apparent that the question between the North Fife Company and the guarantors of dividends on their capital is not quite so simple as this mode of presenting it would suggest.

I have given the general result of this agreement between the promoters and Messrs Arbuthnot, Latham, & Company, and I only intend to refer to it in detail so far as necessary for this judgment. For there is an immense amount of material, even in this branch of the case, which must be avoided if any pretence of brevity is to be attained. I have purposely spoken of the promoters and not of the Company, for I think that there is a grave question whether the Company, though created by statute, had in 1906 yet come into existence, and as to the validity of a good many of the earlier actings of those who assumed to represent the Company. But I do not desire to cumber this judgment with any question not necessary for the decision of July 17, 1913. the case, and I shall assume that the agreement was made by a properly constituted board of directors of an existing company. Also I have spoken of Messrs Arbuthnot, Latham, & Company as the real contracting parties. But they created as an intermediary, ad hoc, the Engineering, Electric, and Construction Syndicate, Limited, for good reasons, fully explained. This Syndicate was just their alter ego, and the ostensible transaction in 1906 was between the North Fife Company and the Syndicate.

On its face the contract was a contract to construct, not as was contemplated by the Act a double, but only a single, line of railway with land and bridges for a double line. The Syndicate, as nominal contractors, undertook not only (1) to construct the line, but also to pay or provide (2) the legal and parliamentary costs of the Act, (3) the legal costs incurred by the Company during construction of the line, (4) a sum of £4400 for the administrative expenses of the Company during construction, and in addition (5) to pay for all land required, subject to a right to any surplus land. I should have mentioned that the capital of the Company was £180,000, in 18,000 £10 shares, with a borrowing power of £60,000, in all £240,000, and that it was open to the Company to issue £60,000 of their share capital in preference shares. In consideration, then, of these undertakings, article 6 of the agreement provided that the Company should pay to the contractors £240,000, exactly the amount of their share and debenture capital, "of which £109,400 shall be paid in ordinary shares of the Company, £60,000 in preference shares, and £60,000 in 4 per cent debenture stock of the Company, . . . and the remainder, namely the sum of £10,600, in cash."

The history of this £10,600 is worth pursuing. It had a double origin. In the first place, the Act, section 16, required as a quorum for general meetings five shareholders, holding not less than £10,000 of the Company's capital. In the second place, there was required for the expenses of the Act and for the costs of administration during construction a sum of about £10,600 in cash. Accordingly, with the idea of legalising their proceedings and to produce this sum, 1063 shares were subscribed and paid for in cash, producing £10,630, and this was the only sum in cash in respect of its shares which was ever subscribed, or ever came into the coffers of the Company, and it was immediately turned over to the Syndicate under the agreement in order that they might implement their cash obligations to the Company. The amount was provided to the extent of £1500 by the subscription for qualification shares by five directors, to the extent of £9100 by members of the firm of Arbuthnot, Latham, & Company, and of the balance of £30, for some unexplained reason, by three officials of the Company each taking a share. And in the end, when the rest of the capital was disposed of by the Syndicate at much below par, it was thought not only just, but competent, to place the partners of Arbuthnot, Latham, & Company, pari casu with those who acquired the remaining shares, by giving them ex post facto an equivalent rebate. This remarkable transaction shows clearly that the parties to it understood and appreciated the so-called construction agreement exactly as I do.

But the provision of the contract to which I wish to draw particular attention is contained in the seventh and following sections:—The contract

July 17, 1913. price of £240,000 was arbitrarily divided into £195,000 for works and maintenance, and £45,000 for land and parliamentary and other costs. Then a schedule of prices was to be made out by the Syndicate, or contractors, subject to the approval of the Company's engineer, under which, irrespective of real values, the costs of the works and maintenance should work out at £195,000, and such schedule of prices was to be the basis on which the valuation for payments to account, as the work proceeded, should be made. In the same way the remaining £45,000 also was to be arbitrarily divided into £15,000, to be attributed to the element of costs and to be met at once by payment in ordinary shares, and £30,000, to be attributed to land, and to be doled out along with the monthly payments for works, in proportion to the acreage, not the value, of land taken, as compared with the total land required.

Newburgh
and North
Fife Railway

But an astute attempt was made to legalise the transaction or make it square with the assumption that share capital can, under an Act embodying the Companies and Railways Clauses Acts, be issued in return for work done. I have shown how the "contract sum of £240,000" was (article 7) to be artificially divided and attributed proportionally to the value of work from time to time completed and the acreage of land taken. At the expiry of each calendar month (article 8) the engineer was to estimate the value of work executed, &c., during the month. And, in estimating that value, he was to "have regard to the division of the contract sum mentioned in the preceding clause hereof," and a schedule of prices was, as already stated, to be made out, irrespective of real value, under which the execution of the work, including maintenance, "shall work out at £195,000, and such schedule of prices shall be the basis on which the valuation of payments on account is to be made." For the value of work so estimated, &c., the engineer's certificate was to be issued to the Syndicate, as contractors. Then (article 9) the amount of the engineer's certificates was to be paid "by crediting the amount of each certificate on or by the issue as fully paid to the contractors or as they might direct of the shares ordinary or preference and the debenture stock in such proportions as shall be within the Company's legal powers." To which intent certificates of indebtedness were to be issued by the North Fife Company for the amount of the engineer's certificates, in order that the amount of these certificates of indebtedness might be converted into the shares or debenture stock to cover which they had been issued.

To complete the statement of facts, I have only to add that at the time this agreement was made between the North Fife Company and the Syndicate, the Syndicate had provided themselves with constructional contractors, ready to make the line on a cash basis of something like £160,000—it is unnecessary for my judgment to go into more accurate calculations—and that the Syndicate had in view the marketing of the shares in blocks of £12,000, as they actually did, on terms that the takers must accept £6000 ordinary along with £3000 preference and £3000 debenture stock at an overhead price of 80 per cent, though their scheme was generally expressed as if preference and debenture stock were taken at par, and ordinary at 60 per cent, which works out to the same thing. The result was a realisation of the Company's capital at a rebate (for I cannot call it a discount), when certain allowances are made, of something like £50,000.

In these circumstances the Railway Commissioners have determined that July 17, 1913. the amount of the paid-up share capital (the debenture capital not falling to be considered) of the North Fife Company, towards payment of the dividend on which the North British Railway Company are bound to contribute, is £180,000, being the whole authorised share capital of the Company. In this determination I think that the Commissioners' judgment is not well founded.

Co. v. North

Ld. Johnston.

We have had a very able and learned argument on this part of the case, and a very exhaustive citation of authority, but much of it has been, I think, beside the point. There was a long discussion, for instance, on the question whether a company, created by special Act incorporating the Companies Clauses Acts, could issue its stock at a discount. I do not think that the North Fife Company has established that general contention. But I do not propose to enter on its discussion at length. I content myself by saying that the contention is in the teeth of the terms of the Company's special Act, and of the Companies Clauses Acts of 1845, 1863, and 1869, and is supported only by the general rubric of the much canvassed case of Webb v. Shropshire Railways Company,¹ whereas a perusal of the case itself shows that its circumstances do not support the general rubric, for they were special, almost unique, while the terms of the Act in question were adapted solely to suit those special circumstances. Even Romer, J.—who appears to have held personal views on the general question hitherto unsupported, which he adumbrates in Webb's case,¹ and to which as Judge of first instance he gave effect in the *Brighton Marine Palace case*²—in *Webb's case*¹ admits that the general considerations “do not apply to this case at all.” The opinion of Lord Shand in *Klenck's case*³ is also prayed in aid by the North Fife Company. That opinion does not touch the general case which we have here. It is only that “apparently in certain limited cases the shares of railway and other companies which have adopted the Companies Clauses Acts may be issued at a discount.” This is not one of these limited cases, cf. Lord Macnaghten in Ooregum Gold Mining Company.⁴ But I do not think that the North British Company are concerned with this question. For, first, it is impossible to describe the transaction regarding the capital of the Company, when analysed, as the issue of stock or shares at a discount. And, in the second place, I do not think that the North British Company are entitled directly to raise it. It is one for the shareholders inter se, or for the creditors, should the equivalent of a winding-up prove necessary and possible.

What the North British Company are concerned with, but what, as I have already said, has rather been lost sight of in the argument, is the interpretation and enforcement of an agreement. I have already dealt with the essential provisions of that agreement, but it must be noted that it was a provisional agreement—provisional on the Act passing, and the line being made under the Act. Thus article 1 says that, “in the event of an Act being obtained and the capital being subscribed,” the North Fife Company

North Fife Company: article 5, that out of this balance the North Fife Company shall pay certain recurring claims, which commonly fall upon a Company such as it: articles 7 and 8, that "if the net revenue accruing to the second parties (the North Fife Company) is not sufficient to pay a dividend of 4 per centum per annum on the paid-up share capital" of the Company, the North British Company shall contribute to make up the deficiency out of certain specified sources.

To the expression in article 1, "In the event of . . . the capital being subscribed," and to the expression in article 7, "on the paid-up share capital," I am only able to give that meaning which the ordinary use of language demands. When a man is said to "subscribe" for capital in a company, and there is nothing in the document to qualify the expression, the expression imports that he undertakes to pay his subscription in cash, and so when the share capital is spoken of as "paid-up share capital," the expression imports that it has been paid up in cash.

There is nothing in the agreement in question to qualify these expressions, but there is something which leads directly to support the ordinary construction. The agreement is dependent on an Act being obtained, and it is entered into with reference to that Act and in reliance on its terms. When one turns to that Act it is found that the preamble narrates the obligation of the North British Company under the scheduled agreement to contribute, if necessary, to make up a dividend of four per cent on the "paid-up share capital" of the North Fife Company. And when the sections of the Act are examined, I do not think that there can be the slightest doubt that "paid-up share capital" means capital divided into shares, and, so far as paid-up, paid-up in cash. Section 6 says that the capital shall be £180,000 in 18,000 shares of £10 each, and that the Company may raise any sum not exceeding £60,000 of the said capital by the creation and issue of preference shares, provided that no such preference shares shall be created or issued until the Sheriff certifies that a like sum of £60,000 of the said capital has been issued as ordinary share capital, and accepted, and one-half thereof has been paid up. Again, section 8 says that the Company shall not issue any share under authority of the Act, nor shall any such share vest in the person accepting the same until a sum not less than one-fifth of the amount of said share is paid in respect thereof. Again, section 9 says that a fifth of the amount of a share shall be the greatest amount of a call, that two months at least shall intervene between successive calls, and that three-fourths shall be the utmost aggregate of calls made in any year. Again, with regard to the exercise of the borrowing powers conferred, section 11 says that "No such sums shall be borrowed until £60,000 (being one-third share of the capital of £180,000) is issued and accepted, and one-half thereof is paid up in respect of each" sum of £20,000, which goes to make up the £60,000 to which the borrowing powers are limited. Lastly, section 14 says that "All monies raised under this Act, whether by shares, debenture stock, or borrowing, shall be applied only to the purposes of this Act to which capital is properly applicable."

I do not propose to enter on an examination of the Companies and Railways Clauses Act of 1845 and the subsequent Acts. It is, I think, sufficient to say that in their every provision they consist with, and would lead to the same conclusion as, the Company's special Act of 1897.

When these provisions of the special Act of 1897 and of the general Acts incorporated therewith are referred to, there cannot, I think, be the slightest doubt that—when the parties contracted by the scheduled agreement that, in the event of an Act being obtained and the capital being subscribed, the North Fife Company should purchase the land and build the line, and that the North British Company should contribute to make up the deficiency of net revenue to pay a dividend of 4 per cent on the paid-up share capital of the North Fife Company—parties were dealing, as regards the North British Company's guarantee, on a cash basis, and nothing but a cash basis. It is not conceivable that any Company or individual should have undertaken such a guarantee on any other condition, for to read the agreement as the North Fife Company now seek to read it would be to assume the North British Company to undertake an indefinite guarantee, the onerousness of which would depend not merely on the costs of construction, which they could estimate, but on the credit of the North Fife Company, which they could not, because it would become a guarantee of dividend upon a capital liable to be watered according to the necessities and at the discretion of the North Fife Company. The probabilities of the situation are, of course, no conclusive indication of the intention of the agreement, but when they consist with its terms they cannot, I think, be left out of sight.

The argument for the North Fife Company must then come to rest on their contention that a great deal of water has flowed through Westminster Bridge since the Company and Railway legislation of 1845; that we have become accustomed to the practice of what are styled "contractors' lines"; that innumerable small lines have been in use to be made on contracts based not on cash, but on shares; and that everyone, including the Legislature sitting at Westminster, knows this, and legislates and contracts accordingly. I have always understood that what ninety-nine people do without legal warrant does not become legally warrantable to the hundredth, and I should be very much surprised to learn that Parliament in 1897 had any idea, when they were passing an Act authorising the making of a railway, containing the usual anxious and stringent clauses relating to the creation and issue of capital such as the one in question, that they were authorising the exercise of compulsory powers and the dealing with share capital in the way which has been here adopted, and that anyone dealing with the promoters or with the Company must be held to have dealt with that knowledge and in view of such a possibility. The bare suggestion is to impute to the Legislature the folly of continuing a practice which had ceased to have any meaning, and the dishonesty of sending forth statutes containing specious clauses which they knew to be empty words.

I think that what I have just indicated was the real case attempted to be

Newburgh and North Fife Railway Co. v. North British Railway Co.
 Ld. Johnston. There is, so far as I know, no case which directly raises this question, and only one which can be said to raise it indirectly, viz., that of Rixon v. Edinburgh Northern Tramways.¹ Undoubtedly, in the last end of a series of most complicated transactions, there was evolved a contract for construction of the balance of a line of tramways for payment in shares, based not on the face value but on the speculative and depreciated market value of the shares. I do not disguise the fact that the Court assumed the competency of such a contract. But the point now at issue was not raised, and though it might and should have been raised, I cannot, particularly having in view the judgment of the House of Lords, regard it as a considered judgment on the point in question. No reference was made either to the Company's special Act or to the Companies Clauses Acts of 1845 et seq. It may be asked, How comes it that so-called "contractors' lines" have come to be made without challenge? I think the answer is plain. The conception of the transaction indicated by the phrase involves a fraud on the Legislature indeed, but in circumstances in which no one has both title and interest to challenge. It is only where abnormal circumstances occur, as here, and I admit also in Rixon's case,¹ that challenge is possible.

But the North Fife Company endeavoured to present their agreement with the Syndicate under the guise of payment in shares for work done, and to pray in aid the authority of cases decided under the Registered Companies Acts of 1862 et seq. The attempt is specious. But even if the analogy holds, which I doubt, the substratum of fact fails, as I trust the analysis which I have made of the real terms of the transaction between the North Fife Company and the Syndicate has shown. There was no true payment in shares for work done, even in the sense of the authorities founded on. For there can be no doubt that in the case of registered companies shares can only be issued on a cash basis, and to be paid in money, or else in money's worth. It is true that, if there is a valid contract by the company for the acceptance of something of substantial value as money's worth, the Court will not inquire strictly into the adequacy of the consideration.² Yet "the cases decide that a man must really pay for the shares. And further that, if the contract makes it manifest on its face that the taker of the shares is paying less than their nominal cash value, he may be liable for the balance."³ It is of the essence of such a transaction that, as the claim of the Company is on a cash basis, so the value of the consideration given by the shareholder is a cash value. No case has occurred, and on the principle of the cases founded on no case could, I think, occur in which the depreciated value of the share as a marketable article is set against the actual value, as estimated by the parties, of the work done, services rendered, or material supplied, or in which the value of the latter is on the face of the contract artificially inflated in order to exhaust the nominal value of the shares. Take it either way, that is precisely what has been done here.

For these reasons I have come to the conclusion that the method of proceeding adopted in 1906 by the North Fife Company, in the first place, ^{Newburgh and North Fife Railway Co. v. North British Railway Co.} was not warranted under that Company's Act of 1897, and, in the second place (and this is sufficient for the decision of the case), was not such as to bring into operation the guarantee obligation of the North British Company under the agreement between them and the North Fife Company scheduled to that Act. On this branch of the inquiry, therefore, I think that the order of the Railway Commissioners was wrong, and that their declaration that, according to the true construction of articles 7 and 8 of the scheduled agreement, "the amount of the paid-up share capital of the applicants towards payment of dividend on which the defendants are bound to contribute is £180,000, making with a debenture issue of £60,000 a total of £240,000," should be recalled, and that a consequent modification should be made in their finding of expenses.

Having thus determined, so far as I am concerned, that the order of the Railway Commissioners was wrong, it remains for consideration whether it is competent for the Commissioners, if the case be remitted to them, to do anything further under the reference, and if so, what? I refer to what I said at the outset of this judgment as regards the attitude of the North British Railway Company in the event of the Commissioners being found to be wrong, upon which no judgment has, or could have, yet been given. I would remind your Lordships that the scheduled contract contains a provision (section 14) to the effect that "all questions which may arise between the parties hereto in relation to this agreement or to the carrying out of the same, shall be referred to arbitration under, and in terms of, the Railway Companies Arbitration Act, 1859." Under the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873, section 8, and the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888, section 17 (2), it is competent to bring in the Railway Commissioners as arbiters in place of special arbiters, with appeal to this Court.¹ According to the practice of the Commission no deed of submission, defining the question to be submitted and exactly limiting a priori the functions of the Commissioners as arbiters, is required. The practice apparently is to commence such proceedings by an application and answers, and by these papers for the parties to make the questions at issue appear. In their paper in this case the Newburgh Company, having stated that their authorised capital was £180,000, that the whole of it was created and issued, and that the value thereof amounted to £180,000, maintained and claimed that the paid-up share capital towards payment of the dividend on which the defendants, the North British Railway Company, were bound to contribute, amounted to £180,000. At the same time they conceded that the defendants countered their contentions, and they, therefore, applied to the Court for an order determining, inter alia, the difference which has arisen between the applicants and the defendants "as to the amount of the paid-up share capital of the applicants, towards payment of the dividend on which the defendants are bound to contribute." But there arise, on this statement and on the counter-statement of the defendants, these questions:—

1st. Is the paid-up capital of the Newburgh Company on which the

2nd. Is the paid-up capital in the sense of the agreement any less sum than £180,000?

3rd. Though the share capital of the Newburgh Company may not be either £180,000, or any less sum, in the sense of the agreement, ought not the North British Company, on equitable principles, to contribute towards payment of a dividend on something which may be termed for shortness a quantum valuit?

Ld. Johnston.

4th. Are either the second or the third questions, or both, within the jurisdiction of the Commissioners to decide?

I take the fourth question first. I remain of the opinion which I stated in the former case between these parties,¹ that the third question is outside the contract, and therefore could not be disposed of by the Commissioners as arbiters. It assumes no liability under the contract, but a liability outside the contract. Neither do I think that the second question is within the reference, because it is just in another guise a reference to equitable considerations.

The conclusions which I have already reached involve this proposition, that the capital of the Company has neither been issued nor paid up in the sense of the contract. In a sense it has been issued. Personally I do not think that it has been legally issued, but I accept the view that the parties to this case have neither the title nor the interest to try that question. How then has it been issued? It has, except as to £10,000 or thereby, been dealt out to the Syndicate, on a fictitious not on a cash basis, proportionally to the work done by the subsidiary contractor. The Syndicate have marketed it to purchasers, who are now the shareholders, for what they could get, which works out at somewhere about 80 per cent of its face value, throwing in the debenture stock issue. It will not stand in the sense of the contract as issued and paid-up in the hands of the shareholders at its face value. It never was properly subscribed even in fact. But, passing over that difficulty, how are you to ascertain any other value than its nominal value, at which it is to be taken for the purpose of the contract? It is said it has been issued in respect of work done, and can be held as paid up in the sense of the contract to the extent of the real value of the work done. How is that to be ascertained? It can only be ascertained in one of two ways. Either you must take the price at which the Syndicate, who got the stock, actually sold it to finance the venture on which they had entered; or you must ascertain, independently of that stock exchange transaction, what the Syndicate can show to have been the real cost of the work when reduced, as it can from the books of the Syndicate be reduced, to a cash basis. Now it appears to me that neither of these operations is an operation under the contract. The contract has been broken, or perhaps, more properly stated, the conditions of the contract, on which the guarantee of dividend becomes enforceable, have not been complied with. We should, if we sent the case back to the Commissioners, be remitting to them to do something which is not within their jurisdiction—viz., to find July 17, 1913. on equitable considerations a figure which is to be substituted for the figure ^{Newburgh} which should have been ascertainable under the contract, but cannot be ^{and North} so ascertained. Though I regret it, I am obliged to say that, except of ^{Fife Railway} consent of parties, the Commissioners have no jurisdiction to entertain the ^{Co. v. North} questions—the second and third which I have indicated above, or either ^{British Rail-} of them—which remain between the parties, and that we have no juris- ^{way Co.} diction to remit to them to do so. ^{Ld. But should your Lordships on this branch of the case be, as I understand you are, of a different opinion, I should gladly acquiesce, because further litigation would thus be avoided and this is greatly in the interest of the parties.

Though the matter is not strictly before me for decision, I think it right to express my opinion that there is room in equity for fixing a quantum based on the actual or cash costs under the subcontract, plus a reasonable brokerage for the issue of stock, such as was recognised in the case of Metropolitan Coal Consumers' Association,¹ and cases there referred to and distinguished, and plus proper administrative charges during construction, but not including any allowance for the remuneration of the Syndicate for their intervention. I am of this opinion, because the scheduled contract is a many-sided one. It must be assumed to have been entered into, so far as their guarantee obligation is concerned, by the North British Company for valuable consideration. Through the making of the line, they have received and have accepted that consideration, and in equity a surrogatum ought to be found for the obligation which they undertook, but which cannot now be enforced in terms under the contract. It would be a pity that, when a more appropriate tribunal is not only constituted but is already in possession of the facts, the parties should require to have recourse to this Court by new proceedings. For myself I think this desirable result can only be reached by consent of parties. But, as I have already said, I gladly acquiesce in a different course being taken, should that in the opinion of your Lordships be possible.

LORD SALVESSEN.—In this case I have had the advantage of reading Lord Johnston's opinion; and as I agree in his narrative of the facts and much of his reasoning, it is unnecessary that I should go as fully as he has gone into the details of the case. Many of the points on which he has touched are not directly involved in the decision of the case, although they have a bearing on what is the true issue between the parties, namely, the sound legal construction of article 7 of the agreement of March and April 1897. The words upon which the whole controversy turns are as follows:—"If the net revenue accruing to the second parties is not sufficient to pay a dividend of four per centum per annum on the paid-up share capital of the second parties then the first parties shall . . . contribute such sum as may be necessary" to pay off such deficiency. I purposely omit for the sake of simplicity the sources from which the deficiency is to be made up, for the guarantee is not an absolute one in form; although for practical pur-

July 17, 1913. poses it may be treated as absolute in substance. It was so dealt with when the memorandum to blocktakers was issued; for it is there stated:—"It will be seen from the attached reports that the undertakings given by the North British Company are stated by the experts to practically amount to a 4 per cent guarantee." The one question in the case is, what is the meaning of "paid-up share capital of the second parties"? Does it mean such capital as the North Fife Company actually issued as paid up; or does it mean, as the North British Company contend, capital which is paid up in cash or its equivalent? The Railway Commissioners have found that the former is the sound construction on the footing, which they hold to be established in fact, that the agreement which the North Fife Company made with the Syndicate for the construction of the line was bona fide, and that the terms to which they consented were justified, looking to their pecuniary exigencies and the state of the money market at the time. I am unable to assent to this view. I think the contractual obligation undertaken by the North British Company was based upon the assumption that the capital of the North Fife Company would all be subscribed by the public in the ordinary way; and I cannot understand how it should be enlarged by the circumstance that the promoters of the North Fife Company found it necessary, in order to get their line constructed, to issue their ordinary shares as fully paid when they received in money or money's worth only 60 per cent of the nominal capital.

Newburgh
and North
Fife Railway
Co. v. North
British Rail-

Lord Salvesen.

Lord Johnston has referred in detail to the various sections of the private Act of 1897 which make it plain to my mind that the Legislature in authorising the construction of the new railway had only in view the issuing of capital for money or money's worth. In particular, I think that the provisions as to the issue of debentures demonstrate this; for it is declared that no sum shall be borrowed "until £60,000 (being one-third of the share capital of £180,000) is issued and accepted and one half thereof is paid up in respect of each of the said sums of £20,000." This provision is for the security of debenture-holders, and is, I think, unambiguous. We are not here concerned with any claim by the debenture-holders; for the debentures were issued in blocks along with the preference and ordinary shares. But I think any independent debenture-holder whose money had been taken on the footing that the Act was to apply, would have had serious reason to complain if he had found that his security was to consist of one-half in cash of the value of the ordinary shares; and that the obligation of the shareholders to pay the remainder was to be discharged by an additional payment of 10 per cent.

The position of the North British Railway Company with regard to their guarantee appears to me to be in pari casu. The promoters of the North Fife Railway Company Act, in terms of the Standing Orders of Parliament, deposited an estimate of expense amounting to £176,296, 7s. 6d. for the construction of the line as a double line. The total authorised capital, £240,000, was fixed on this basis. As matters have turned out, the whole capital has been issued as fully paid-up; although only a single line, with the necessary passing places and also with the land and bridges for a double line, has been constructed. The Railway Commissioners seem to think that this may be accounted for by the fact that the cost of construction had increased between the date that the Act was obtained and the date at which July 17, 1913. the line was actually constructed. I assume that there was a general rise in prices; but if so the capital authorised to be issued made ample provision for such a contingency. The whole sum paid to the contractors for the construction of the single line with the necessary buildings and equipments was under £128,000; and the total sum expended, including preliminary expenses, administration, and purchase of lands, amounted to under £170,000, leaving £70,000 for the construction of the remaining line. As the £128,000 included bridges, stations, and land for a double line, it may safely be assumed that the additional £70,000 would have sufficed to construct the double line to which the agreement referred.

Lord Salvesen.

The construction to be put upon similar words was the subject of decision in the case of Arnison v. Smith.¹ In that case a prospectus had been circulated inviting application for debentures which were to rank "in priority to £300,000 share capital (£200,000 of which has been subscribed)." In point of fact the amount of capital subscribed was much less, unless there were taken into account £100,000 of shares which had been issued as fully paid to a firm of contractors who had agreed to construct the waterworks for £400,000, of which £300,000 was to be paid in cash and £100,000 in fully paid-up shares. The Court held in these circumstances that it was untrue to say that £200,000 had been subscribed, and that persons who were induced to take debentures on the faith of the prospectus were entitled to damages against those who issued it. In my opinion the words "paid up" which are used in this contract are clear and unambiguous, and mean what the Court decided that the word "subscribed" meant, that the shares had been issued for cash. If therefore this guarantee had been obtained from the North British Company on a statement that £180,000 of capital had been paid up, when in fact it had been allotted to the contractors for the construction of the line, I think it is obvious that the guarantee would not have been binding. It appears to me to be equally plain that it cannot be enforced against the North British Company to an extent beyond the amount that was actually paid up. To that extent the guarantors are responsible under their guarantee, but no further. Had the Company been in a position to get the public to subscribe for its shares there is no reason to suppose that it could not have made as favourable a contract as the financiers who received substantially the whole capital. It would not have required to give any bonus in the shape of shares, although it may be that it would have incurred a certain amount of expense in advertising, printing, and the like, the reasonable amount of which it is quite possible to ascertain.

It has been suggested that the North British Company must have had in view at the time when the contract was entered into that the North Fife Company might have to resort to a method similar to that which it actually adopted of raising capital. I see no ground from which this can be inferred. In 1897 an investment on which a return of 4 per cent was guaranteed by a great corporation like the North British Railway was by no means unattractive; but whether or not, this surely cannot affect the construction of the contract. If the directors of the North Fife Company had been prepared

July 17, 1913. to deal fairly with the North British Company they might have given them the option of providing the necessary capital for the construction of the line; but the parties were no doubt so much at arm's length at this time that such a proposal could scarcely have been made. The effect, however, of what the Company has done was, as the Syndicate stated in the memorandum to blocktakers, to fix the price at which the ordinary stock was disposed of so as to yield a return of $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent to 6 per cent per annum instead of the 4 per cent which the North British Company had contracted to pay. In other words, on the construction which has commended itself to the Court below, the guarantee for 4 per cent was increased by the action of the North Fife Company to a guarantee of 6 per cent on the actually paid-up capital without the guarantors being consulted in the matter. It is easy to understand why the directors of the North Fife Company came to make what would undoubtedly have appeared to be, in the earlier history of the Company, so improvident a bargain. After nearly ten years of futile attempts to float the concern, they found themselves in the unpleasant position of having personally to meet the preliminary expenses of obtaining their Act, unless in some way they could get the line constructed. To extricate themselves from this predicament they were not unnaturally prepared to assign the whole authorised capital of the Company in return for an obligation by a prominent financial house to undertake the construction of the line and relieve them of the heavy bill they had incurred. Neither party to the transaction seems to have thought that the North British Company, on whose credit they traded, had also a claim to be considered.

Newburgh
and North
Fife Railway
Co. v. North
British Rail-

Lord Salvesen.

In the view I have taken it is unnecessary that we should consider many of the questions which were so anxiously debated. The sole question, to my mind, is one of the construction of a simple contract of guarantee, and does not involve the much controverted point as to whether a company incorporated by Act of Parliament can issue its original shares at a discount. I reserve my opinion on this matter; but would desire to say that as at present advised I do not agree with Lord Mackenzie, nor with the decision of Romer, J.,¹ on which he bases his opinion. To say that because such a company has been specially authorised by statute to issue further shares at a discount it must therefore be entitled to issue its original shares at a discount does not appear to me to be a convincing argument; and there are strong considerations of public policy which are adverse to such a power. It is unnecessary, however, to pursue the matter. It is still more beside the point that undertakings authorised by Parliament, for which it has been found impossible to obtain from the public the necessary capital, have often been constructed by contractors in the hope that they would ultimately be able, when the undertaking was completed, to induce the public to buy the shares. It may well be that the transferees of shares from such contractors, or even the liquidator of the company, after it has become insolvent, cannot challenge the original issue of the shares on the ground that they were not issued for cash or its equivalent; but that is a department of law with which we are not here concerned. I only refer to it because an argument was presented to us on behalf of the North British Company July 17, 1913. to the effect that on analogous considerations that Company had been relieved from the contract of guarantee which it undertook. Such a con- and North Newburgh

Lord Salvesen.

The practical result which I reach accordingly is that I think we must reverse the decision of the Court below, "that the amount of the paid-up share capital of the applicants towards payment of dividend on which the defendants are bound to contribute is £180,000." So far I agree with Lord Johnston. We have not had a full argument as to what figure should be substituted; but for the guidance of the Commissioners, I think we should express our views as to the method by which they may reach the true amount of paid-up capital, more especially as on this matter I do not appear to be in full accord with Lord Johnston. That is easily done by reference to the statement of income and expenditure. As regards the three heads—expenses, land purchases, &c., and works (assuming these to be properly vouched)—I think that they represent the equivalent of cash. The next item "Loss on sale of shares and debentures," so far as it consists of the discount of 40 per cent on the ordinary shares, must be struck out. So also, I imagine, must management and underwriting fee, although, instead, the Company will be entitled to take credit for such expenses as would reasonably have been incurred in making a successful public issue. The administration expenses of the Syndicate are equally inadmissible, and also, prima facie, the excess of income over expenditure. In short, the account of paid-up capital must be stated on the same footing as if a public issue of shares had been made and taken up, and the Company had been put in funds to pay in cash for the construction of the works and the parliamentary expenses. On this principle the Commissioners will no doubt easily be able to arrive at an estimate of what was the amount of capital that was paid up within the meaning of the guarantee, upon which alone, as I think, the North British Company are bound to contribute.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I concur in the opinion of Lord Salvesen, which I have had the advantage of reading.

LORD SKERRINGTON.—[In his Lordship's absence, his opinion was read by the Lord President]—The agreement of 31st March and 5th and 6th April 1897, between the appellants, the North British Railway Company, and the promoters of the Newburgh and North Fife Railway Company (now represented by the respondents, the Newburgh and North Fife Railway Company), is silent as to the amount of the capital which the parties regarded as necessary for carrying out the undertaking, and no doubt they left the amount to be fixed by Parliament. According to my reading of the agreement it was a condition precedent of the respondents' obligation to construct the railway, and of their right to do so in a question with the appellants, that the whole of the share capital authorised by the special Act should be subscribed. Of course the appellants had it in their power to

July 17, 1913. issue at a discount of new shares or new stock or even of the residue of the original share capital—26 and 27 Vict. cap. 118, sections 16-21; 30 and 31 Vict. cap. 126, sections 27-29; 32 and 33 Vict. cap. 48, sections 5, 6, and 7. The implications from the Acts of 1867 and 1869 is that capital, whether original or additional, cannot be issued at a discount except in the particular cases there mentioned, or unless authorised by the special Act. The case of *Webb v. Shropshire Railways Company*¹ is an example where an Act of Parliament was construed as authorising the issue of fully paid-up original stock at a discount; but the circumstances and language of the Act were special. Lord Lindley (then L.J.), who delivered the opinion of the Court of Appeal, distinguished between stock issued as fully paid up under statutory powers and shares liable to calls. The case of *Statham v. Brighton Marine Palace and Pier Company*² is a judgment by Romer, J., to the effect that a company governed by the English Companies Clauses Act, 1845, may issue fully paid original shares at a discount in the same manner as new shares. The English Act does not contain any clause corresponding to section 37 of the Scottish Act, but the judgment does not proceed upon the absence of any such clause. The learned Judge expressed the opinion that shares subscribed for must be paid for in full, but he rested his judgment upon the view that the Act of 1845 contemplated that shares may be acquired otherwise than by subscription, and that shares allotted without subscription may be issued at a discount. He referred, I presume, to section 8 of the English Act (which is the same as the corresponding section of the Scottish Act). I respectfully dissent from the view that so momentous a result can be implied from a clause which is on the face of it bungled. In my view the words founded on by Romer, J., were intended to meet the case of a person who had acquired a right to scrip before any issue of shares, and who might, if the company were willing to accept him, be treated as if he himself had subscribed and paid the deposit, and so had become entitled to a share in the company.

The agreement of 31st May 1906 between the respondents and the Construction Syndicate does not, in my judgment, afford even prima facie evidence to the effect that the respondents received either full value, or indeed any ascertainable value, in return for the £169,400 of shares which were issued to the Syndicate or its nominees. The price of £240,000 payable to the Syndicate was a lump price, which was carefully fixed in such a manner as makes it impossible to discover how much the respondents were to pay (1) for the construction of the railway; (2) in lieu of brokerage for placing their shares and debentures; (3) for the land required for the railway, and in order to satisfy all claims under the Lands Clauses Acts for injurious affection, accommodation works, &c.; and (4) for the expenses incident to the obtaining of the special Act and for all other expenses, past and future, for which the respondents might be or become liable. If in the agreement the total price of £240,000 had been separable into lump sums representing the consideration agreed to be paid in respect of each of these four heads, it might have been possible for the Commissioners to decide whether the price payable to the Syndicate, so far as payable in shares, was or was not fixed upon the footing that each share was worth less than its July 17, 1913. face value. I do not think that the Commissioners had materials before them which in law entitled them to find, as they did, that the respondents "did not in fact issue their shares at a discount." As regards brokerage, a company may pay a reasonable reward in respect of the trouble and expense of placing its shares,¹ but it cannot make itself or its capital liable for a sum in lieu of brokerage which can neither be ascertained nor taxed. If the total price had been apportionable, it would have been possible to ascertain whether the lump sum agreed to be paid on this head was or was not excessive, and to restrict it if necessary. Again, under the special Act (sections 2 and 4) the respondents had power to acquire land under the Lands Clauses Acts either by agreement with the sellers or compulsorily, but they had no power to apply their capital in paying an unascertainable lump sum in return for an indemnity by the Syndicate against all claims in respect of land taken or injured. Here again, if the total price could have been apportioned it would have been possible to ascertain whether the price agreed to be paid on this head did or did not exceed the sums for which the respondents were legally liable, and to restrict it if necessary. Lastly, there is a decision of the House of Lords to the effect that it is ultra vires of a statutory company to pay a lump sum in respect of the expenses authorised to be paid by the usual clause in the special Act, irrespective of the actual amount of such expenses as taxed.² In the Court of Session some importance was attached to the fact that the persons who received the lump sum of £17,000 stood in a fiduciary relation to the company; but the House of Lords proceeded upon the simple ground that it was ultra vires of the company to pay more than the actual expenses as taxed. As regards this matter also, if the total price of £240,000 had been severable, it would have been possible to ascertain whether the portion of it representing expenses did or did not exceed the actual expenses, both past and future, as taxed. In so far as it exceeded the actual expenses the lump sum could have been restricted, as was done in *Mann's*² case. That case was followed in Mason's Trustees v. Poole & Robinson.³ Within certain limits I do not doubt that a statutory company, when agreeing upon a price to be paid for property or services, may include in the price additional and undefined amount in respect that the other party to the contract accepts certain risks and agrees to indemnify the company against all liability beyond the sum agreed upon. For example, an ordinary contract to build a house or railway includes either expressly or tacitly an allowance for "contingencies." So if a railway company employs a solicitor at a salary, the solicitor accepts a lump sum and in return agrees to make no further claim against the company, however much his ordinary professional charges may exceed his salary. Again, no one doubts the power of a railway company to protect itself against certain risks by insurance. But there is no real analogy between such cases and the present one. In considering whether this particular agreement was within the powers impliedly conferred upon the respondents by their statute, one must keep in view that the question is to be decided, not upon abstract or logical grounds, but by reference to the ordinary way in which a particular kind of business is conducted in this country. I accept the view of the Commissioners that in this particular case it would have been beneficial for the respondents to have possessed the power to enter into the construction agreement; but in the majority of cases the possession of such a power would be a doubtful benefit. It is, however, enough to say that a contract of this kind is so unusual in practice that a power to make it cannot be implied from a power to make a railway, to buy land, and to pay expenses. In England the Court has been very liberal in supporting honest agreements by which the price of property or services was to be paid for in fully paid shares (*In re Wragg, Limited*¹), and possibly we might have followed that decision if some definite lump price had been fixed for the construction of the railway. But it was admitted by Mr Dempster, the secretary of the respondents' Company, and is indeed obvious, that the total price of £240,000 included some unknown amount "for expenses for raising the capital," in addition to round sums of £30,000 and £15,000, which it was estimated would cover the cost of the land and the expenses.

The practical result, in my judgment, is that the respondents have failed to adduce evidence which entitled the Commissioners to find that the paid-up share capital of the Newburgh and North Fife Railway Company amounts to any sum exceeding £10,600. The case must be remitted to the Commissioners in order that they may, if necessary, determine the actual amount of the legal consideration which the Syndicate gave to the respondents in return for the 16,940 shares allotted to them or their nominees. It is for the respondents to prove the amount, but it is to be hoped that the parties will be able to agree on a figure without further litigation. What I propose to add is in no way binding either upon the Commissioners or upon the parties, but it may be useful to indicate the way in which, as at present advised, I think that the account should be stated. The Syndicate are entitled to credit for the sum which it would have cost to construct the railway if a contractor had been employed by the respondents in the ordinary way and if the respondents had themselves supervised the construction. Credit must also be given for a reasonable allowance in lieu of the brokerage which the respondents would have required to pay in order to place the shares and debentures. The Syndicate must further be credited with the £4400 of cash paid by them to the respondents, with the interest so far as legally paid to shareholders and debenture stock holders during construction, and with the amount paid in respect of land claims and expenses for which the respondents were legally liable. On the other hand the Syndicate must be debited with the market value of the debenture stock when issued, and with the cash received by them from the respondents. I may have omitted items from both sides of the account, and of course there must be an adjustment of interest. The balance of this account will represent the consideration paid by the Syndicate for the 16,940 shares.

LORD PRESIDENT.—Although I must now consider that, as the majority July 17, 1913. of your Lordships are against me, my opinion is wrong, I think that the judgment of the Commissioners here ought to have been affirmed, and I can express my opinion in a very simple form.

I first ask myself this question—which was argued before us—Is it possible for a railway company, which is formed under the Companies Clauses Act, to pay for its railway not in cash, but by issuing shares? I confess that I think it is; and seeing that these operations have been going on in numberless cases ever since the year 1845, and that what are called contractors' lines have often been before the Court and had the consideration of the most eminent persons, including, amongst others, the late Master of the Rolls and many members of the House of Lords, I must say that I should look with the gravest suspicion upon the discovery by the learned counsel for the North British Railway Company, for the first time in the history of this matter, that such transactions were entirely illegal. It has often been for the interests of parties to maintain that they were illegal, and yet no one seems to have thought of this contention till now. The particular case of which I would remind your Lordships is that much-contested litigation, Rixon v. Edinburgh Northern Tramways Company.¹ There every effort was made to destroy the contract made with Messrs Dick, Kerr, & Company, and yet this expedient was never thought of.

Newburgh
and North
Fife Railway
Co. v. North
British Railway Co.

That question having been answered in this way, I next ask myself—Must that not have been one of the methods of construction of the line which the North British Railway Company had in view when they made their contract? And here, without insisting on the matter, I would remind your Lordships of what is very clearly stated by the Commissioners, namely, the great interest which, in the past, the North British Railway had in the making of this line. This line was a necessary link in what, at that time, was their keen competition with the Caledonian Railway Company. It was in potentiality one of the pawns—if, indeed, it was not a piece of higher denomination—in the struggle between the two great Scottish companies which, happily, resulted in the peace agreement. It is equally clear that, the peace agreement having once been concluded, the line became of very little use to the North British Railway Company, and therefore it is not at all wonderful that, if they are entitled upon any legal ground to get out of their guarantee, they should seek to do so. I am far from expressing any moral blame in this matter. Public companies are entitled to stand upon their legal rights—nay more, probably they are bound to stand upon their legal rights. But as to the question of the North British Railway Company, at the time of the inception of the agreement, having been willing to table a high price for what they were getting, I do not think that the judgment of the Commissioners leaves any shadow of doubt. If that is so, I think that this is one of the methods in which they must have contemplated that the capital should be issued. And the capital was so issued.

The only remaining argument is one which was strenuously urged by the learned counsel, and is also touched on in the opinion of Lord Skerrington which I have just read, namely, whether this was not a void agreement as

July 17, 1918. being ultra vires of the directors of the Company. I need scarcely say that Newburgh and North Fife Railway Co. v. North British Railway Co. I entirely accept the authority of the House of Lords in Mann's case.¹ I have no doubt that you cannot, as there, pay a slump sum and say, "I will give you that in order to relieve me of the expense of the company, and what has been actually paid shall not be looked into." But although that is so, the question, I imagine, can only arise between the company and the

Ld. President. person with whom they have so contracted. It is quite true that a void agreement is, as a rule, void not only as between the two parties who made it but also to all the world. But I see no reason to suppose that personal bar—or, as it is called in the sister country, estoppel—may not operate with regard to an agreement which is void just as much as an agreement which is voidable. I think it is impossible for the North British Railway Company here to say that, as a matter of fact, this agreement is void and that the line has never been constructed at all. They themselves are founding upon the agreement under which the line has been constructed in order to insist upon their right to work the line upon certain terms; and that being so, this argument also fails.

The result, therefore, in my opinion, would be that the view of the Commissioners should have been sustained. I only add that, necessarily, my opinion is based upon the finding in fact which the Commissioners have given, namely, that this construction contract was perfectly fair and above-board and did not represent any donation from the one party to the other.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with the Lord President.

LORD DUNDAS.—I also agree with the Lord President.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The majority of the Court being against the determination of the Commissioners, it must be reversed. On the other hand, Lord Johnston's view was that nothing more could be done by the Commissioners, but the other three Judges, composing the majority, are of the view that it should be remitted to the Commissioners to find out how much capital has been legally issued in the sense of the contract, so we shall give effect to this view.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords having, along with three Judges of the Second Division, considered the note of appeal and whole process, and having heard counsel for the parties, recall the order of the Court of the Railway and Canal Commission, of date 21st March 1912, in so far as the said Court declares 'that the amount of the paid-up share capital of the applicants towards payment of dividend on which the defendants are bound to contribute is £180,000,' and in place thereof, find and declare that the said defendants are only liable under their agreement with the applicants to contribute towards payment of dividend on so much of the issued share capital of the applicants as was issued in consideration of cash or the equivalent of cash, and remit to the Court of the Railway and Canal Commission, after such further

In an action of damages for slander the issue submitted to the jury was whether "on or about 12th March 1912" the defender, at or near a shop occupied by the pursuer and in presence and hearing of one of the pursuer's neighbours, had made a slanderous statement concerning the pursuer which imported that he was a thief.

The jury having found that the slander had been uttered by the defender at the place and in the circumstances set forth in the issue, but that it had been so uttered in February 1912, the Lord President, on account of the discrepancy in the dates, directed that the verdict should be entered for the defender.

Penang
Foundry Co.,
Limited, v.
Gardiner.

The partners in a foundry, with the object of forming a syndicate to acquire the business, obtained deposits of sums of money from a number of persons. The project of forming the syndicate having failed, the partners floated a limited company, proposed to the depositors that their deposits should be applied in taking shares, and offered to each of them a number of shares in proportion to, but of a greater face value than, the amount of his deposit. The company having gone into liquidation, one of the depositors, who had been allotted shares and had received from the company share certificates which bore that the shares allotted to him were fully paid, though in fact they were not, was sued by the liquidators for the price of his shares.

Circumstances in which held (by the Lord Ordinary, Cullen) that, as the defender had accepted the shares in bona fide reliance on the statements in the certificates that they were fully paid, the company was barred from maintaining that they were not fully paid; and defender assolized.

THE PENANG FOUNDRY COMPANY, LIMITED, registered in Penang under the Companies Ordinance, 1889, of the Straits Settlements, now in liquidation, and James Wilson Halifax and Richard Philip Phillips, of Penang, the liquidators thereof, and William Donaldson, Glasgow, their mandatary, brought an action against A. H. Gardiner, OUTER HOUSE,

Lord Cullen.

Jan. 31, 1913. Campbeltown, Argyllshire, for £560, being the price of fifty-six shares of 100 dollars each allotted to and held by the defender in the company. For these shares the company had never received full consideration, but the defender was in possession of share certificates of the Company bearing that the shares were fully paid, and the question in the case was whether in the circumstances the defender was liable for their price.

Penang
Foundry Co.,
Limited, v.
Gardiner.

The facts as disclosed at a proof are given in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary (Cullen), who on 31st January 1913 pronounced an interlocutor in which he assoilzied the defender from the conclusions of the summons.

OPINION.—[After referring to a question of relevancy discussed at an earlier stage of the case]—The Penang Foundry Company, Limited, acquired the business of a private firm called the Penang Foundry Company, the three partners of which were named Wemyss, Baldwin, and Lawrence. In 1902 Wemyss came to Glasgow and set about the formation of a syndicate to acquire the business of the firm. He enlisted the assistance of his correspondent in Glasgow, Mr MacLavery, of the firm of Graeme & Company. A number of persons, including the defender, were induced to entrust sums of money to Wemyss and his firm. The arrangement about these monies was that they were to be used in taking up shares in the syndicate if and when it was formed, and that the firm should, in the meantime, pay five per cent interest on them, and be liable to repay them in the event of the syndicate not being formed. These parties I shall call the depositors. It was a condition of the arrangements made with the depositors that no syndicate should be formed unless there was raised in all £20,000. This amount was not raised, and the syndicate never came into existence. The depositors remained an unorganised series of individuals who had entrusted varying sums of money to the Penang firm on the footing above explained. For these sums they held receipts granted by Wemyss on behalf of the firm. They had no collective activities, but were simply so many investors who were separately induced to deposit monies with the firm with the view of their possibly being bound together in a syndicate.

The project of forming a syndicate was finally abandoned by Wemyss on 11th April 1903. He then resolved to essay the flotation of a limited company in Penang, and returned to Penang. At this point the firm stood liable to repay to the depositors the monies which they had advanced. Mr Wemyss, however, acting for the firm, put before the depositors the proposal that their deposited monies should be applied to taking shares in the limited company. As an inducement he offered that depositors who agreed to this course should receive for each £100 deposited fourteen shares of the new company of 100 dollars each. This offer was intimated to the depositors by a circular letter in terms of No. 210 of process. Thereafter there was sent out, to some of them at least, a letter asking them to sign an authority for the allotment of shares to them in the form shown in No. 71 of process. The defender received the letter in the form of No. 210. He took no notice of it. He says he did not receive the letter transmitting the form of authority shown in No. 71, and that he signed no such authority. I believe him. Mr MacLavery, to whom such letters of authority would in ordinary course have been sent, says that he never saw such an authority signed by the defender. No such authority by the defender has been found. It would appear, however, that the defender, who was an old friend of Mr MacLavery, and in touch with him, had indicated that he was favourable to Wemyss's proposal. He did nothing, however, that I can see actually binding himself to take shares at this stage. Mr MacLavery sent out to Wemyss in Penang the book No. 15 of process, containing the names, &c., of the depositors, with remarks as to what he understood each depositor was Jan. 31, 1913. inclined to do as to taking shares.

The limited Company was incorporated in Penang on 14th December 1903. On 18th March 1904 the directors (Wemyss and his partners) met and resolved to allot. Next day they did allot. Thereafter share certificates were sent to this country, including certificates in favour of the defender, for fifty-six shares of 100 dollars each. The certificates were sent to Mr MacLavery's firm. On 28th July 1904 they wrote to the defender, sending him the said certificates of fifty-six shares, and asking him to return in exchange the receipts which had been given to him for his various deposits, amounting in all to £400. On 1st August 1904 the defender acknowledged the certificates, which he retained, and returned the said receipts. The certificates so sent to the defender and accepted by him bore that the shares were fully paid up.

There is thus no dispute that the defender, by accepting the share certificates sent to him, agreed to become a member of the Company in respect of the fifty-six shares in question. And I have no doubt on the evidence that the defender, in accepting the certificates, believed in the truth of the Company's statement on the certificates that the shares were fully paid up.

It is now necessary to give some explanations as to the formation of the limited Company. It was preceded by an agreement between (1) the firm of the Penang Foundry Company and (2) Mr Samuel Warnock of Glasgow, as trustee for the prospective limited Company. Mr Warnock is a partner in Mr MacLavery's business in Glasgow. The agreement provided, inter alia:—(1) that the nominal capital of the prospective Company was to be 600,000 dollars in 6000 shares of 100 dollars each; (2) that the vendors should sell and that the Company should purchase the business of the Penang Foundry Company and assets thereof; (3) that the price should be 200,000 dollars at 2s. per dollar, payable as follows, viz., "The directors may satisfy any portion of the said consideration not exceeding 100,000 dollars by the allotment to the vendors of shares in the capital of the Company to an equal nominal amount, the said shares being credited as fully paid up, and the balance of the said consideration shall be payable in cash"; (4) that the purchase should be completed on 30th June 1903, and the Company should then declare what "portion of the said consideration it proposes to satisfy by the allotment of shares, and shall pay the balance of the said consideration in cash to the vendors or as they shall direct. The shares which are to be allotted in lieu of cash shall be allotted to the vendors or their nominees on or before the 14th day of July next (1903), and before such allotment the Company shall cause this agreement to be registered with the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies."

This last-mentioned provision was not fulfilled and the agreement has not yet been filed. The Company was not incorporated until 14th December 1903. The option given to the Company by the agreement to satisfy part of the price by shares could not thus operate in terms of the agreement, and no new agreement on this subject was made. The defender had nothing to do with this agreement.

On record the pursuers aver that the real vendors under this agreement were (1) the ostensible vendors, the Penang Foundry Company, and (2) the alleged syndicate of whom the defender was said by them to be a member. They further aver that, as a member of the syndicate, the defender had allotted to him directly his fifty-six shares as part of the ear-marked vendors' shares under the agreement. The defender was thus on record represented as having knowingly accepted his fifty-six shares for a consideration other than cash under a contract which has not been filed. This ground of action, however, is now exploded, as there never was a syndicate, and the sole vendor to the Company was the firm of the Penang Foundry Company.

Although the case made, on averment, by the pursuers has for the most part disappeared, there remains their averment that no cash was paid by the

Jan. 31, 1913. defender to the Company for the shares. As to the fact, the evidence in my opinion is to the effect that cash was not paid. The question then arises, what is the effect of the Company having, in the circumstances of the case, issued the share certificates to the defender bearing that the shares were fully paid? On this question it is common ground that the law prevailing in Penang is the same as in this country. Accordingly, if the defender had acquired the shares in question by transfer from an allottee without notice of the fact that, contrary to the Company's representation on the certificates, cash had not been paid for them, it is conceded that the Company would have been barred from denying the truth of their representation. The pursuers, however, contend that this principle cannot apply in the case of an allottee of shares. I confess I do not see why, if the conditions necessary to raise the bar exist. The principle of bar or estoppel is a general one of the common law and, in this connection, cannot be limited to transferees of shares unless the conditions of its application are only possible in the case of transferees. But this, in my opinion, is not sound. It is true that an allottee will not often be in the position of not knowing the footing on which shares which he accepts have been allotted to him. But he may be, and if, in such circumstances, he accepts shares in reliance on the Company's representation that they are fully paid up, and without notice to the contrary, he is, I think, as much entitled to hold the Company to that representation as a transferee acquiring right from him without notice would be. Mr Buckley (9th edition, p. 63) says:—"Nevertheless a bona fide purchaser and transferee or even allottee of shares which the company by the share certificate state to be paid who has no notice that the shares are not what they are certified to be is not liable, although the shares have not in fact been paid." For the application of this rule to allottees he cites Parbury's case, [1896] 1 Ch. 100, and Bloomenthal v. Ford, [1897] A. C. 156. Parbury's case was expressly approved by Lord Justice Lindley in Bloomenthal, [1896] 2 Ch. 532. I quote his statement of it. "In that case Parbury was an allottee from the company. He had paid a person the full amount of those shares in order that that person might pay the same to the company and procure for Parbury a proper certificate. The person (Wright) who received the money, and who was connected with the company, misapplied the money; but the company gave Mr Parbury a certificate that they had received his money and that his shares were paid up in full, although in truth that was not the case. The doctrine sanctioned by the House of Lords in Waterhouse v. Jamieson, (1870) L. R., 2 Sc. App. 29, and in Burkinshaw v. Nicolls, (1878) 3 App. Cas. 1004, was properly applied in Parbury's case, although he was an allottee and not a transferee. In the case of Bloomenthal v. Ford, from which I have quoted, the decision of the Court of Appeal was against the allottee on the ground that, as they held, he had not adequate ground for believing the shares to be fully paid although he did so believe. The allottee, Bloomenthal, had been induced to lend money to a company on the faith of a security to be given him in the form of fully paid up shares in it. The shares were allotted to him as fully paid up, but in fact they were not." The decision of the Court of Appeal was against Bloomenthal on the ground that, while he believed the shares were fully paid up, he was not justified in this belief. The decision was reversed by the House of Lords where the plea of estoppel against the company was sustained and Bloomenthal was held not liable to pay anything on the shares.

In the present case, the defender did not make an application to the Company for an allotment of shares. Nor is there evidence that he authorised Mr Wemyss to apply for shares in his name. There is no evidence that Wemyss did so. The position was that Wemyss had offered to procure to any of the depositors who consented to put the amount of their deposits in the Company fourteen shares of 100 dollars each for each £100 of deposit. The defender had indicated to Mr MacLavery that he favoured this proposal, but he had not bound himself. He did not sign Jan. 31, 1913. the letter of authority (No. 71) asked by Wemyss. When the share certificates were sent to him by Mr MacLavery on 28th July 1904, he might, Penang I think, have rejected them. He accepted them, however; and in accepting Foundry Co., them I have no doubt that he believed in the truth of the Company's state- Limited, v. Gardiner. ment that they were fully paid up. He acted in perfectly good faith. I am accordingly of opinion, in these circumstances, that he is entitled to plead the Company's said representation against their present demand. The pursuers maintained the special point that even if the defender was justified in believing that the shares had been paid up to the extent of his deposit (£400), he was not justified in believing that the balance of the share value in dollars (the total value was 5600 dollars) had been paid up. Now it is true that the defender's deposit of £400 was not of the value of 5600 dollars, although it is left uncertain what the exact amount of the shortage was. Let it be stated at 1600 dollars. But the defender's position was that Wemyss had offered, if he agreed to put his deposit of £400 in the Company, to procure him fourteen shares of the value of 100 dollars each. And he had no information as to how Wemyss was to procure him these shares, so far as their nominal value exceeded his deposit, which might have been by Wemyss paying the amount of the excess on each, or, what is the same thing, setting off the cash price of the business under the agreement pro tanto against the value of the shares. The defender simply accepted the shares when offered to him by the Company, and he accepted them on the footing on which the Company tendered them to him, namely, that they were fully paid up, and fully believing in the truth of the Company's representation to that effect.

I am accordingly of opinion that the defender is entitled to absolvitor.— [His Lordship then disposed of a plea that the action was premature.]

Reparation—Negligence—Lease—Title to sue—Wife of tenant of house on common stair injured owing to defect in stair—Wife's title to sue landlord Feb. 7, 1913.
—Property. Mellon v. Henderson.

The wife of the tenant of a dwelling-house on a common stair brought an action of damages against the landlord for injuries sustained by her owing to the defective condition of the stair. The defender pleaded that the pursuer had no title to sue, in respect that she was not a party to the lease.

Held (by the Lord Ordinary, Hunter) that the pursuer had a title to sue, in respect that the stair was not included in the lease but remained under the control of the landlord, who was bound to keep it reasonably safe for tenants and other persons using it as a means of access to the houses.

Cameron v. Young, 1908 S. C. (H. L.) 7, and Cavalier v. Pope, [1906] A. C. 428, distinguished.

ON 10th December 1912 Mrs Julia Giblin or Mellon, wife of Arthur OUTER HOUSE. Mellon, brought, with his consent, an action against George Hender- Lord Hunter. son, in which she sued for £500 as damages for personal injury.

The pursuer averred, inter alia.:—(Cond. 2) "The pursuer's husband, the said Arthur Mellon, is the tenant of a dwelling-house situated at 33 Hamilton Street, Glasgow, and forming part of a tenement of which the defender is the proprietor. The access to the said dwelling-house is by a common passage and stair built of stone and consisting of two flights of steps entering from the street. The first flight of steps leads up to the common stair window, and the second flight to the first flat upon which the said dwelling-house is situated. The right-hand side of the common stair is bounded by the wall of the tenement, and the left-hand side by an iron railing. The said common stair does not form part of the subjects let to the pursuer's husband or to any of the tenants in said property, but is merely an access thereto and remains in the control of the defender as proprietor of the subjects, and it is his duty to maintain said stair in a safe condition." (Cond. 3) "On Sunday, 24th November 1912, about 5.45 P.M., the pursuer, on returning home, ascended the said common stair, and on placing her foot on the first step of the second flight of steps, that step and the step above, along with part of the railing, gave way, and the pursuer was precipitated to the back close, a distance of ten feet or thereby." (Cond. 4) "The pursuer, who was pregnant at the time, was very severely injured as the result of the said accident. . . ." (Cond. 5) "The said accident was due to the fault and negligence of the defender in failing to maintain the said stair in a safe condition. It was the duty of the defender to use all reasonable care and diligence in keeping the access to his property in such a state of repair that no damage from its defective condition should occur to persons lawfully using it. In particular, it was his duty to have said stair properly inspected from time to time by competent persons, especially as the tenement was an old one, and to see that it was maintained in a safe and secure condition. The defender, however, failed to do so. . . . The defender's failure to inspect said stair, and to have it properly strengthened and secured, was the cause of the accident to the pursuer."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) The pursuer having been injured through the fault and negligence of the defender is entitled to reparation.

The defender pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) No title to sue. (2) The averments of the pursuer being irrelevant, and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons, the action ought to be dismissed.

At adjustment of issues on 24th January 1913, the undernoted authorities were referred to.¹

On 7th February 1913 the Lord Ordinary (Hunter) allowed an issue in the usual form.

OPINION.—The pursuer is the wife of the tenant of a dwelling-house, part of a tenement of houses situated at 33 Hamilton Street, Govan, Glasgow. She sues her husband's landlord for £500 damages in respect of personal injuries sustained by her in consequence of part of the railing and two of the steps of the common stair, on one of which she was standing, giving way, with the result that she was precipitated to the back close, a distance of about 10 feet. It is said that the common stair was in a defective condition, and that this condition would have been disclosed by an inspection by competent persons such as it was the defender's duty to make. The defender is said to have failed to make such inspection.

For the defender it was maintained that the pursuer had no title to sue the action, and that in any event she had not stated a relevant case. These pleas were based mainly upon the decision of the House of Lords in the case of Cameron v. Young, 1908 S. C. (H. L.) 7, [1908] A. C. 176. In that case the wife and children of the tenant of a dwelling-house were held to have no title to recover damages from the landlord for loss and injury through illness caused by the insanitary state of the premises. Lord Robertson, who gave the leading opinion, said, "The question is whether the appellants, who are not parties to the contract of lease, have a good ground of action against the landlord. It seems to me perfectly clear that they have not; and I rest my opinion not alone on the authority of Cavalier v. Pope, [1906] A. C. 428, but on principle common to the laws of Scotland and of England, which Cavalier v. Pope applied." Feb. 7, 1913. Mellon v. Henderson.

In Cavalier v. Pope the owner of a dilapidated house contracted with his tenant to repair but failed to do so. The tenant's wife, who lived in the house and was aware of the danger, was injured by an accident caused by the want of repairs. It was held that, as she was a stranger to the contract, she was not entitled to recover.

In both cases to which I have referred the accident occurred within the subjects actually let by the landlord to the tenant, to whom in consequence of the contract of lease the possession and control of the premises had passed. The present case is distinguishable from those cases by the following circumstances, which are averred: first, that the common stair where the accident occurred does not form part of the subjects let to the pursuer's husband; and, second, that the stair is merely an access to the subjects, and remains under the control of the landlord, in whom the duty of maintaining the stair in a safe condition is said to remain. I think that these circumstances, if proved, make the principle upon which the cases of Cameron and Cavalier were decided inapplicable to the present case.

There have been a number of cases decided both in England and Scotland where the proprietor of a tenement of houses has been held liable either to the tenant or to a third party visiting the tenant for injuries sustained in consequence of the dangerous condition of a common stair. Among the cases cited to the House of Lords in the course of the argument in Cameron's case were the cases of M'Martin v. Hannay, 10 Macph. 411 and Miller v. Hancock, [1893] 2 Q. B. 177.

In M'Martin's case a child who was visiting the tenant of a house in a tenement was killed by falling through the railing of the common stair where one of the banisters was wanting. The proprietor was found liable in damages. Lord Neaves said, "When this proprietor found the stair not properly fenced it was his duty to repair the banisters. He was bound to do so, to insure the safety of all who had a right to be there, whether invited or not. Policemen, tax-gatherers, officers of the law serving process, and such like might all have a right to be there, and this gap ought not to have been standing open so as to be in a dangerous state."

In the case of Miller v. Hancock the proprietor of a building in the city of London let out the different floors as business premises to different tenants, but retained in his possession and control the staircase which formed the access to the different premises. A visitor to one of the tenants was injured in consequence of the worn and defective condition of one of the stairs. He was held entitled to recover damages from the landlord. Lord Esher, M.R., said (at p. 179), "So much of the house, whatever it might be, as the defendant did not let, and therefore this staircase, remained in the possession and control of the defendant. What, under such circumstances, are the rights of the tenants and the duties of the landlord towards them? Their only mode of access to their tenements was, as I have said, by this staircase. This may be called an easement, but it was, in my opinion, under the circumstances, such an easement as the landlord was bound to keep so as to afford a reasonably safe entrance and exit to the tenants. . . . Furthermore, it is obvious that in such a case the landlord must know that premises so let will be of no use to tenants, unless those who supply or deal with the tenants, such as tradesmen or others having business with them, also have access to the premises. . . . I think that there is a relation between the landlord and those who resort to the premises for business purposes, from which a duty arises on the part of the landlord to keep the staircase, which is the means of access to the premises, in reasonably safe repair." Lord Justice Bowen in the same case said (at p. 181), "It appears to me obvious, when one considers what a flat of this kind is, and the only way in which it can be enjoyed, that the parties to the demise of it must have intended by necessary implication, as a basis without which the whole transaction would be futile, that the landlord should maintain the staircase, which is essential to the enjoyment of the premises demised, and should keep it reasonably safe for the use of the tenants, and also of those persons who would necessarily go up and down the stairs in the ordinary course of business with the tenants; because, of course, a landlord must know when he lets a flat that tradesmen and other persons having business with the tenant must have access to it." It does not appear that the scope of the doctrine so expounded by these learned Judges was confined to cases where, as in Miller's case, the landlord had in fact retained one room in the tenement for his own use.

Lord Robertson, in his opinion in Cameron's case, expresses no disapproval of the law laid down in what I may describe as the common stair cases. On the contrary, I think he may be held impliedly to have approved of them. He says, "I have examined all the cases prior to Cavalier v. Pope, which were cited at the bar; and with one apparent, but not real, exception, and one real exception, there is none which conflicts with that decision. All fall within the category of external relations which I have discussed." The two cases there referred to were Shields v. Dalziel, 24 R. 849, and Hall v. Hubner, 24 R. 875, which it is unnecessary to consider in detail.

The defender made a point upon the relevancy that the pursuer merely averred that the common stair was in the control of the landlord, but did not say that it was not only under the control of, but also in the possession of, the landlord. I do not think that this criticism of the pursuer's case is sound. In the case of Mathieson's Tutor v. Aikman's Trustees, 1910 S. C. 11, a boy who had been sent on an errand to premises let as offices to a number of tenants was injured by falling from the lift entrance on the ground floor into the well of the lift—an accident alleged to have been caused by the defective working of the automatic gate which fenced the entrance to the lift. The Court allowed an issue. Lord Kinnear said the pursuer "must prove that the accident was due to the fault of the proprietors, and the only fault alleged is that they have failed to remedy a defect which they knew to exist, or which they were bound to know if they had performed the duty which is assumed to be imposed upon them of keeping the lift in good order. The proof of that duty, of course, depends upon satisfactory evidence upon the first part, that they were really in the control of the lift."

I was also referred to a recent decision of the Second Division in a case of Deans v. Groves.¹ That case has not been reported, but I have been provided with a copy of the record and of the opinions expressed by the Judges. The claim there was at the instance of the tenant of a house in a tenement, for himself and as tutor for his pupil children, and by his wife, against the landlord for injuries sustained by them in consequence of the roof and chimney head of the tenement collapsing and falling through the ceiling of their house upon them. It was maintained that the pursuers had no title to sue—a plea based upon Cameron v. Young, and directed against the claim so far as insisted in by the wife and children. The Division allowed a proof before answer. Lord Salvesen dissented on the ground that no special cause had been shown for refusing a jury trial to the pursuer. In the course of his opinion he said, “I think that Cameron v. Young does not apply to the parts of a landlord’s property which are not let, and it is not said that the chimney head in question was part of the subjects let to Deans. . . . The common stair cases which were pleaded to us seem to me to be exactly in point, and there has never been any suggestion that these cases were ill decided; on the contrary, they are distinguished and approved in the case of Cameron v. Young.” Lord Guthrie, although he assented to the course of remitting the case to the Sheriff-substitute to take a proof, expressed approval of what Lord Salvesen said as to the application of Cameron v. Young.

Succession—Accumulations—Thellusson Act (39 and 40 Geo. III. cap. 98) —Election—Equitable compensation—Applicability of Thellusson Act to accumulation for equitable compensation.

By his trust-disposition and settlement a testator directed his trustees to hold his estate for his only child, a daughter, in liferent, and on her death to convey the fee to her issue, whom failing, to other persons named. The daughter having claimed and received legitim, the trustees retained and accumulated the income of the estate. On the expiry of twenty-one years from the testator’s death the daughter brought an action against the trustees concluding for payment to her of the future income of the estate, on the ground that further accumulation was prohibited by the Thellusson Act and that the income fell to her as her father’s heir. In defence it was averred that the accumulated income had not sufficed to replace the capital withdrawn by the pursuer in name of legitim; that under the principle of equitable compensation the income fell to be accumulated till the capital was so replaced; and that accumulation for this purpose was not within the operation of the statute.

Held (by the Lord Ordinary, Hunter) that further accumulation of the income was prohibited by the Thellusson Act, and decree pronounced in favour of the pursuer.

WILLIAM GRANT, wine and spirit merchant, Dunoon, died on 14th January 1890, predeceased by his wife, and leaving one child, Mrs Agnes Grant or Hutchison. OUTER HOUSE.
Lord Hunter.

By his trust-disposition and settlement, dated 5th October 1889, Mr Grant conveyed his whole estate to trustees, and as to the residue thereof directed as follows:—“(Sixth) With reference to the residue of my estates after the payments above mentioned, and under burden of the foresaid annuities, I direct my trustees to hold the same for behoof of my wife in liferent, should she survive me, she being bound out of said provision to maintain and educate our daughter Agnes, and failing my wife by her predeceasing me, or upon her death should she survive me, I direct my trustees to hold the said residue for behoof of my daughter Agnes in liferent, and for behoof of any children she may have, equally amongst them, and their issue per stirpes in fee. On the death of my wife or daughter, whichever of these events shall last happen, the capital of the shares falling to such children or their issue shall be payable to them upon their respectively attaining majority, or if females, on their respectively attaining majority or being married, whichever of these events shall first happen. (Seventh) Should my said daughter die without leaving issue, I direct my trustees, upon her death, or upon my wife's death, should she survive her, to pay over the whole free residue of my estates to" two sisters of the testator, and failing either of them their issue. This provision to the testator's daughter was declared to be in full satisfaction of all legal claims competent to her on his death.

The testator's daughter, Mrs Hutchison, on attaining majority on 4th December 1897 claimed and was paid her legitim. After paying the legitim, the trustees under Mr Grant's trust-disposition and settlement accumulated the income of the estate remaining in their hands.

On 6th May 1913 Mrs Hutchison, with the concurrence of her husband, brought an action against the trustees concluding for payment of the sum of £255, 6s. 5d., the amount of the free income of the estate in the hands of the defenders from 14th January 1911 to Martinmas 1912.

The pursuer averred that the Thellusson Act came into operation with regard to these accumulations on 14th January 1911; that the testator had settled his property in such a manner as, in the event (which had happened) of the pursuer declining to waive her right to legitim, required accumulation of the income, and that she was the person who would have been entitled to the income if no accumulation had, as a result of the terms of the testator's settlement, been required.

The defenders averred that the amount of the testator's estate, after payment of debts, duties, &c., was £7200, and that the amount paid to the pursuer in respect of legitim was £3614, 16s. 7½d. They also averred that "the trust funds remaining in their hands amounted as at 14th January 1911 to £4739, 14s. 11d., whereof £3517, 11s. 7d. was the amount of the original capital remaining after payment of the pursuer's legitim and after deduction of capital charges to that date, and the balance of £1222, 3s. 4d. was the amount of revenue accumulated. The said accumulated revenue thus fell short of the sum paid to the pursuer in name of legitim by the sum of £2392, 13s. 3½d. Under the provisions of the said trust-disposition and settlement the income fell to be paid annually to the pursuer, and the said accumulation of income is occasioned by the pursuer's action in repudiating the liferent bequeathed to her in the said trust-disposition and settlement and in claiming her legitim in lieu thereof. The defenders are accumulating, as they are bound to do, the income for the purpose of making good to the capital of the residue the loss thereto caused by the pursuer's resorting to her legal rights. Should the pursuer be entitled, in addition to her legitim, to the income set free by her repudiation of the provisions of the trust-disposition and settlement, there will be no means of recouping the trust-estate for June 6, 1918. the sum paid to her in name of legitim, except to the extent of the said sum of £1222, 3s. 4d., and the bequest to her issue, or, failing them, the other residuary legatees will not receive full effect." They further averred that the pursuer had one child who was aged fourteen; that they were bound to hold the estate and accumulate the income till the date when the residue fell to be paid over to the parties who might then be found to be entitled thereto, or until the sum withdrawn by the pursuer in name of legitim was replaced; and that in any case the accumulation of the income was for the payment of debt, or otherwise for the raising of a portion, within the meaning of section 2 of the Thellusson Act.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The accumulation of income on the trust-estate after 14th January 1911 being prohibited by the Thellusson Act, all such accumulations form undisposed-of residue and belong to the pursuer as heir ab intestato of the testator.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(5) The defenders being bound to accumulate and apply the income set free by the pursuer's election of legitim in compensation of the parties injured by said election, and the accumulation of income for this purpose not being within the operation of the Thellusson Act, the defenders are entitled to decree of absolvitor.

The case was heard before Lord Hunter on 5th and 6th June 1913.

Argued for the pursuer;—The Thellusson Act applied if accumulation of income was either expressly or impliedly directed by the testator; and accumulation was impliedly directed if, as here, it was produced by "the natural and necessary operation" of the settlement.¹ It was fallacious to say that the accumulation was due to the operation of the principles of equitable compensation. It was due to the fact that the testator had so disposed of his estate that the parties entitled thereto could not be ascertained till the pursuer's death and that consequently no payment could be made till that date.² The case was not within the exceptions allowed by section 2 of the Act for accumulation of income, seeing that it was not directed for the purpose of raising a provision, nor for payment of a debt, as legitim was not a debt in the sense of the section and, in any case, the legitim had been paid.³ The Act being applicable, the pursuer was entitled to payment of the income released by its operation.⁴

Argued for the defenders;—The present case was not within either the meaning or the letter of the Thellusson Act. As the preamble showed, the Act was designed to thwart provisions for the accumulation of income for the purpose of augmenting the estate and postponing the beneficial enjoyment of the legatees. The accumulation here had neither of these consequences, its sole effect being to replace capital which had been withdrawn from the estate.⁵ The settlement

contained no direction as to accumulation of income, either express or implied, for under its provisions every penny of the interest was to be paid away year by year; and the accumulation was not contemplated by the testator,¹ but was due to the derangement of his testamentary directions by the hostile act of the pursuer. The pursuer having claimed legitim, the principle of equitable compensation applied. Under that principle the Court sequestered the benefit intended for the refractory donee²; and the source of the accumulation here was that principle and not any direction of the testator. In *Lord v. Colvin*³ the Judges observed that the accumulations struck at by the statute were such as resulted from the "inevitable operation of the deed" (which could not be alleged of the accumulations in question) and that an "accumulation resulting from the operation of law" would not be within the scope of the statute. In the present case the accumulation was due to the operation of law.⁴ The compensation did not come out of the testator's estate; it was the pursuer who had to make compensation, and it was as being her property that the income, which under the principle of equitable compensation she had not forfeited, was temporarily sequestered for the satisfaction of the debt she had incurred to the residuary legatees. In any event, if there was here an implied direction to accumulate it was to raise a provision for the payment of debts, and an implied direction to that effect must receive the same protection under section 2 of the statute as a similar express direction. It was not necessary under the section that the debts should be those of the testator,⁵ or in existence at his death.⁶

On 6th June 1913 the Lord Ordinary (Hunter) decerned against the defenders for the sum sued for.

OPINION.—The pursuer in this case is the daughter and only child of the late William Grant, wine and spirit merchant, Dunoon, who died on 14th January 1890. She brings the present action against her father's trustees for payment of a sum of £255, 6s. 5d. as unlawful accumulation of interest upon her father's estate, to which she, as his heir at law, is entitled.

Under her father's settlement the pursuer was entitled to a liferent of his whole estate, the fee being destined to her children, with a destination-over to others named in the settlement. She elected, as she was entitled to do, upon her father's death to take her legal provisions. The result of that election was that temporarily, at all events,—although, as is admitted, not absolutely,—her liferent interest in her father's estate was set free. As there was not a forfeiture clause she was entitled, on the estate being recouped in the amount that she had taken out in respect of her legal claims, to be restored to her interests under the will, i.e., to enjoy the remainder of her liferent interest.

More than twenty-one years, however, elapsed before equitable compensation had effected restoration to the estate from the liferent interest of the amount that had been taken out in order to pay the pursuer's legal claims. Consequently, there is no room in this case, I think, for considering equitable compensation at all. The question is—what is to be done with the accumulations after twenty-one years from the death of the testator? June 6, 1913.

I think the real point in the case is—what has caused those accumulations? On behalf of the trustees it is maintained that it was not the settlement that caused the accumulations, but the election on the part of the beneficiary to take her legal rights. Now under the Thellusson Act what is struck at is illegal accumulations of income arising by direction of the truster, that direction being either express or implied. At first sight there does seem to be a considerable amount of force in the defenders' argument, to the effect that it was the beneficiary's act and not the truster's act that caused the accumulation. But when one asks oneself the further question—Why should the pursuer's election cause accumulation? it is impossible to answer the question as the trustees desire. After the election the life interest was, no doubt, set free, but neither the election nor any rule of law necessitated its accumulation. It went back to the trust, and if it was accumulated at all, it was accumulated in virtue of the trust. Hutchison v. Grant's Trustees.

When one looks at the clause of residue in this case, one finds ample provision for the accumulation, and, in fact, the accumulation in the hands of the trustees just now is going on in virtue of the powers conferred on the trustees by this clause. They have no power and no right to accumulate except such as is thereby given them.

That being so, it appears to me that the provisions of the Thellusson Act, as interpreted in such a case as Logan's Trustees v. Logan, 23 R. 848, or in any other of the leading cases, apply to the circumstances here, unless it can be said that the accumulations come within certain exceptions introduced in the Thellusson Act.

The defenders have pled two of these exceptions in their answer 5, because they quote section 2 of the Act which provides:—"Nothing in this Act contained shall extend to any provision for payment of debts of any grantor, settler, or deviser, or other person or persons, or to any provision for raising portions for any child or children of any grantor. . . ." I must say I do not follow the argument which brings what has occurred here within the scope of these exceptions. No provision at all was made by the truster, and the first exception allows of a provision being made. Further, I do not see that what was done was in any proper sense payment of debt—debt either of the truster or of anyone else. It has not been suggested that the second exception, that it was a provision for a child or children of the grantor or settler, is applicable.

That being so, I hold these accumulations to be unlawful accumulations under the Thellusson Act. The Act itself provides that the illegal accumulations should go to the person or persons who would have been entitled to them if such an accumulation had not been directed. That, of course, would give these illegal accumulations to any person who under the settlement has what has been described in English legal phraseology, and I think also adopted in Scotch phraseology, as a gift in possession.

There is no such case here. In fact it is admitted by the defenders that if there are unlawful accumulations under the Thellusson Act, these constitute intestate succession of the testator. The only person entitled thereto is the pursuer. I do not think that any argument has been submitted which deprives her of her right, as heir of her father, to take whatever was undisposed of by him. She has taken nothing under the will of her father. She merely got in the first instance her legal rights and surrendered her liferent, and now she claims the accumulations which in consequence of the operation of the Thellusson Act have become intestate succession of her father.

I therefore hold that the pursuer is entitled to decree against the defenders, but as this was a case where the trustees were entitled to defend the action, I think the expenses should come out of the unlawful accumulations.

AGENT AND CLIENT. Law-Agent transacting with client's wife.

1. A law-agent acted for a client (who was a partner in a commercial firm) and also, as an individual, made advances to his client's firm. He was, besides, the agent for a branch bank where the firm's bank account was kept, and in that capacity made advances to the firm on overdraft. He also acted from time to time as law-agent for his client's wife with regard to certain investments and other matters. The client's wife, having become entitled to a legacy of £12,000, assisted her husband's business (1) by making direct advances to the firm, (2) by becoming surety for overdrafts from the bank, and (3) by transferring to the law-agent securities for advances made by him to the firm. During these transactions the wife had no separate legal advice. The husband's firm having become insolvent, and the wife having thereby lost the whole of her fortune, she brought an action against the law-agent for recovery of damages for loss sustained by her through his alleged negligence and breach of duty as her law-agent, and for repayment of gain alleged to have been improperly made by him out of his transactions with her. Circumstances in which the House of Lords absolved the defender, having regard in particular to the fact that he had not advised in favour of the transactions and that the pursuer had really acted on her own responsibility. Dick v. Alston, (H. L.) p. 57.

Fraud of agent—Liability of client—Bond left in custody of agent—Fraudulent discharge of bond by agent.

agent, who was also agent for the bondholders and had custody of the bond. On the agent's death it was found that he had embezzled the sum in the bond. In an action by the bondholders against the purchaser of the property for delivery of the bond, held that the pursuers were entitled to delivery of the bond in respect (1) that the bond was not one of the property titles carried to the defender by the assignation of writs, (2) that the pursuers, having given their agent no authority to discharge the bond, were not liable for his fraudulent discharge thereof. Bowie's Trustees v. Watson, p. 326.

See Expenses, 10—Fraud.

AGENT AND PRINCIPAL. Right in Security—Factor's right to retain estate documents in security of debt due by estate.

1. Held that the factor on a landed estate had, as against a bondholder desirous of appearing as a party to proceedings in the Land Court, no right to retain the leases or documents in security of a debt due to him by the estate. Macrae v. Leith, p. 901.

Liability to third parties—Knowledge of agent imputed to principal.

2. The proprietrix of certain subjects handed the title-deeds to her law-agent, a nephew, at whose death it was discovered that he had utilised the title-deeds to obtain money for himself by means of a forged bond over the property. Previously the proprietrix had received a demand for payment of income-tax on "interest" and, not knowing to what such a demand could refer, she asked another nephew, a brother of the law-agent, to make inquiries, in the course of which he learnt that his brother had obtained money for himself on the security of his aunt's title-deeds. He refrained from communicating this to his aunt till after his brother's death, when she heard of the bond for the first time and at once repudiated her signature and raised an action against the bondholders for reduction of the bond and for delivery of the title-deeds. Held that the knowledge of the nephew employed to make inquiries, which he had refrained from communicating, could not be imputed to the pursuer so as to bar her from subsequently repudiating the forgery; and decree granted as concluded for. Muir's Executors v. Craig's Trustees, p. 349.

Usage of trade—Implied authority of architect to employ measurer.

3. Held that there is no usage of trade by which the official architect of a building company, which has not commenced operations, or approved of plans, or instructed the architect to proceed with the building, has implied authority to employ the services of a measurer to the effect of rendering the building company liable for the measurer's charges. Knox & Robb v. Scottish Garden Suburb Co., Limited, p. 872.

Liability of commanding officer for bank overdraft.

4. On the instructions of the commanding officer of a volunteer regiment, an account was opened with a bank in the name of the Finance Committee of the battalion. The bank having brought an action against the commanding officer for the amount of an overdraft, circumstances in which the Court assoiized the defender, holding that it was not proved that he had as an individual entered into any contract with the bank which could infer personal liability against himself. *National Bank of Scotland, Limited. v. ARBITRATION. Exclusion of arbitration clause by rescission of contract.

1. In an action of damages for breach of a contract which provided that any dispute between the parties as to its construction should be referred to an arbitrator, and that "no action shall be maintainable against the insurers except upon" the award of such arbitrator, the question whether there had been breach of contract or not depended on the construction to be put upon a certain clause of the contract. Circumstances, in which held that the parties had not treated the contract as rescinded, and, accordingly, that the arbitration clause was still binding; and action sisted that the construction of the clause in dispute might be determined by arbitration. Hegarty & Kelly v. Cosmopolitan Insurance Corporation, Limited, p. 377.

1. Where one vessel owing to her faulty navigation has damaged another vessel, the maritime lien over the former available to the owner of the latter cannot be made effective by arrestment of the vessel on the dependence of an action against her owner concluding for a sum of damages and separatim for declarator of lien and for warrant to sell. So held in an action for the recall of an arrestment so used. Opinion (per the Lord President) that the maritime lien could be made effective by arrestment of the vessel upon special application, e.g., in the Bill Chamber, after citation of all parties interested. *Clan Line Steamers, Limited, v. Jurisdictionis fundandæ causa—Action for delivery of goods in terms of contract and failing delivery for damages.

1. A company, which was indebted to a bank, entered into an arrangement with the bank whereby it was agreed that, on the bank surrendering certain moveables belonging to the company which the bank held in security, the company should obtain from J., who was indebted to them, a debenture over his assets, and should assign the debenture to the bank in lieu of the surrendered security. from J. ; but before it had been assigned to the bank the company went into liquidation. The bank having claimed the debenture, held that the company did not hold the debenture for the bank, but had, at most, come under a contractual obligation to assign it ; that accordingly they were the parties beneficially interested in it at the date of the liquidation ; and claim for the bank rejected. *Bank of Scotland v. Effect—Illegal preference—Act 1696, cap. 5—Transaction in the course of trade—Sale of insolvent's goods by auctioneer—Retention by auctioneer of debt due to him.

2. A farmer, on surrendering the lease of his farm, instructed a firm of auctioneers, with whom he was accustomed to deal, to conduct a dispenishing sale of the farm effects. At the date of instructing the sale he was in debt to the auctioneers, and he was (but not to their knowledge) in embarrassed circumstances ; but in employing them he had no intention of giving them any preference over his other creditors. The sale took place within sixty days of his sequestration. The auctioneers, who had a clause of lien in their conditions of sale, having retained from the proceeds of the sale the sum due to them, the trustee in the farmer's sequestration brought an action against them to recover this sum on the ground that they had obtained a preference contrary to the Act 1696, cap. 5. Held that, as the transaction was entered into in the ordinary course of trade and without any intention of conferring a preference, it was not struck at by the statute ; and defenders assolized. Crockart's Trustee v. Hay & Co., Limited, p. 509.

Sequestration—Trustee—Personal liability—Adoption of bankrupt's contract by trustee.

3. The trustee on a bankrupt estate sued the former partner of a dissolved firm, of which the bankrupt had been a member, for a debt due to the bankrupt under the agreement of dissolution. The defender was assolized on the ground that the pursuer refused to implement the obligations of the bankrupt under the agreement. Held that the trustee, by thus raising an action founded on the agreement, had not adopted the agreement so as to make himself personally liable for the obligations of the bankrupt under the agreement. Sturrock v. Robertson's Trustee, p. 582.

4. A cautioner under a letter of guarantee was discharged by the creditor with the consent of the trustee on the sequestered estate of a co-cautioner. Held that the consent of the trustee to the discharge was an act of management to which sec. 176 of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, did not apply, and that the concurrence of the commissioners was accordingly unnecessary. *Hamilton's Executor v. 2. Held that a charge of keeping a brothel contrary to section 13 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, may be tried under section 431 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, before a single police magistrate; and that the magistrate is entitled to impose on the accused, if found guilty, a sentence of imprisonment for three months. Observed that proceedings for the offence of keeping a brothel may also be taken under section 403 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, which provides for trial before the Sheriff, or two police magistrates, and limits the sentence of imprisonment to one of sixty days. M'Laren v. - Jurisdiction of Burgh Police Court—Living on earnings of prostitution—Immoral Traffic (Scotland) Act, 1902, sec. 1 (1).
3. Held that a police magistrate sitting in a Burgh Police Court has jurisdiction to try an offence against the Immoral Traffic (Scotland) Act, 1902. Hall v. Macpherson, (J.) p. 100.
- Liabilities of magistrates—Flooding of land in burgh—Responsibility of drainage and road authority—Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879, sec. 179—Edinburgh Corporation Act, 1900, sec. 28.*
4. On two occasions in 1909, after heavy rainfalls, a market garden, on the estate of Craigentenny in the burgh of Edinburgh, bounded by the Craigentenny burn was flooded owing to a culvert which carried the burn under a road being of insufficient capacity to admit free passage of the water, which in consequence overflowed on to the road, whence it found its way into the garden. In an action of damages at the instance of the tenant of the market garden against the Corporation, held that sec. 28 of the Edinburgh Corporation Act, 1900, which inter alia made it unlawful for the Corporation to diminish the supply of sewage water flowing through the burn or to deepen or otherwise interfere with the burn, did not affect the obligation of the defenders at common law, and under sec. 179 of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879, to make and keep the drainage system of the burgh effective, and that accordingly they were liable in damages. Hanley v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, (H. L.) p. 27.
- Powers of magistrates—Use of streets—Proclamation prohibiting holding meetings in streets—Act for staying unlawful conventions (Act 1606, cap. 17).*
5. The Magistrates of Edinburgh issued a proclamation prohibiting the holding of meetings in certain streets of the city, unless a licence to do so had been previously obtained, and imposing penalties for a breach of the proclamation. The form of licence granted by the magistrates bore to be issued in virtue of the powers conferred by the Act 1606, cap. 17. A street orator, who had been convicted of a breach of the proclamation, brought an action for declarator, inter alia, that the magistrates had no authority to issue the proclamation, and that he was not bound to obey it. The Court granted the declarator, holding (1) that the Act 1606, cap. 17, was in desuetude, and (2) that the magistrates were not empowered by common law or by any other statute to issue such a proclamation. Observations (per the Lord President) as to the powers of magistrates to prevent, by means of the police, any conduct tending to interfere with the paramount use of the streets for passage or to lead to a breach of the peace; and as to the right of the public to hold meetings in the streets. M'Ara v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, p. 1059.

Street—New street—Intention to form a new street—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903, sec. 11.

6. Held that a proprietor in a burgh who proposed to build upon his own property a block of three-storey tenements, fronting upon and having access to a public footpath or esplanade lying without the boundary of his property, did not thereby propose to form the public footpath into a new street in the sense of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903, sec. 11; and, accordingly, that the Dean of Guild was not justified in refusing his sanction to the proposed buildings until warrant for the formation of a new street had been obtained. Mason v. Roger, p. 52.

Street—Public or private street—Removal of barricade on private street by town-council—Duty of adjoining proprietors to pave the street—Personal objection—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903, secs. 103 (5) and 104 (2) (d).

7. A barricade, which had been erected across an unpaved private street in a burgh by the adjoining proprietors to prevent it being used as a thoroughfare, was removed by the town-council without the consent of these proprietors, who had refused their consent except on condition that they should not be called upon to pave the street. Some years after the removal of the barricade the proprietors, on being called upon by the town-council to level and pave the street under sec. 104 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903, maintained that the street had become a public street and so was maintainable by the town-council, or in any event that the town-council were barred from calling on them to pave it. Held (1) that the street had not become a public street by reason of the removal of the barricade; and (2) that the town-council were not barred by their actings from now calling on the proprietors to pave it, in respect that these actings had not prejudiced the proprietors in their obligation to pave the street. Magistrates of Alloa v. Wilson, p. 6.

CAUTIONER. Partnership—Retirement of Partner—Bonds and dispositions in security granted by partners—Question whether retired partner principal debtor or cautioner.

1. An association, formed for the purpose of acquiring heritable properties as investments, in the course of their business borrowed sums of money on the security of certain of their properties, for which the partners in the association granted bonds and dispositions in security as trustees for the association, and also as individuals. One of the members thereafter withdrew from the association, under an article of the partnership agreement which permitted any member to retire on finding a satisfactory substitute, and the remaining members granted a bond of relief undertaking to relieve him of any claim made against him by any creditor in respect of the bonds. Neither the partnership agreement nor the bond of relief made any provision for the termination of obligations undertaken during his membership. Held that the retiring member continued to be a principal debtor and was not a mere cautioner with a right to withdraw his cautionary obligation at any time as regarded future liability, and, accordingly, had, in the circumstances, no right of relief against the defenders except that given by the bond of relief. Roughead v. White, p. 162.

2. A letter of guarantee, granted in favour of a bank in security of advances made by it to a limited company, empowered the bank to give time to the debtor without affecting the liability of the cautioners, and provided that the guarantee should continue in force until recalled. Opinion that the recall of the guarantee by a cautioner, while preventing further advances to the debtor on the credit of the revoking cautioner, would not in every case debar the bank from giving time to the debtor after the date of the recall. Hamilton's Executor v. Bank of Scotland, p. 743.

Discharge—Giving time—Creditor assuming control of debtor's business.

3. Averments by a cautioner for a limited company to the effect that the creditor, a bank, held shares in the company, and had assumed control and carried on the business in the interest of the shareholders and to the prejudice of the cautioners, held insufficient to support the contention that the creditor by his actings had given time to the debtor, and had so essentially altered the relation of parties as to discharge the cautioner from his obligation. Hamilton's Executor v. Bank of Scotland, p. 743.

See Process, 4.CHURCH. Seats—Allocation—Heritor—Family pew.

1. A right to a family pew in a parish church, created by allocation to a proprietor of lands in the parish, remains, until another allocation is made, with that proprietor and his successors, so long as they retain the major portion of the lands, whether they occupy the pew or not. Observed (per the Lord President), "When there has been legal allocation the heritor's right to his family pew is exclusive . . . as to the right to sittings in it, and the right to furnish it, and to exclude all others at least until the bell for service has ceased to toll." Paterson v. Brown, p. 292.

Seats—Assignment of sittings—Proof.

2. Opinion (per the Lord President), that an assignment of sittings in a family pew can only be established by writing. Paterson v. Brown, p. 292.

Manse—Glebe—Transportation of Manse—Sale of old site—Presumption that manse built on manse ground and not on glebe.

3. A petition was presented by the heritors of a burghal landward parish for transportation of the manse to a new site, and for authority to sell the old site. The latter part of the prayer was opposed by the minister, who maintained that, as the manse had occupied the site for many years before the right of a parish minister to half an acre of ground, over and above his glebe, as a site for his manse was recognised, the presumption was that the manse must have been built upon glebe, and accordingly that its site remained glebe land and could not be sold by the heritors. Held that, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, it must be presumed that the ground on which the manse stood was dedicated as manse ground, and as such was something other than glebe; and prayer of the petition granted. Heritors of Rutherglen, p. 671.

Dissenting Churches—Trust—Administration—Allocation of trust funds by Churches (Scotland) Act Commissioners—Effect of allocation—Churches (Scotland) Act, 1905, sec. 1 (3), First Schedule, head 4.

4. A trust fund was administered by private trustees, in terms of a trust-deed which directed them to expend the annual income of the residue of the trust-estate upon the "Home Mission" in connection with the Free Church of Scotland, "in such way as they may think proper either through the Church or independently of it," and provided for forfeiture of the bequest in certain events. The Commission appointed under the Churches (Scotland) Act, 1905, to allocate between the Free Church and the United Free Church the "property in question" defined in the Act, which included property held for the purposes of any "mission," pronounced an order allocating to the Free Church and the Home Mission Committee thereof the whole rights and interests which the Free Church had in this trust fund, and declaring that the allocation should, to the extent of the capital value thereof, viz., £9340, be held as to account of a provision of £250,000 made by the Commission, in terms of the Act, for the support of ministers and itinerant preachers and for administration and management of the Free Church. On the trustees continuing to administer the fund independently of the Free Church, the latter brought an action to have it declared that the trustees were bound to pay over the income of the trust to them to be administered for any of the purposes for which the provision of £250,000 had been made. Held that the effect of the Act and of the Order of the Commission had been to alter the administrative powers of the trustees and to render it necessary that the income of the trust should be administered through the Free Church; and declarator granted as craved. Free Church of Scotland v. MacKnight's Trustees, p. 36.

COMPANY. Agreement to take shares—Rectification of register—Removal of shareholder's name on ground that shares had been taken through misrepresentation in prospectus—Quotation in prospectus of report by one of the directors—Responsibility of company for truth of statements in report—Fraud and misrepresentation—Contract.

1. *A company, formed for the purpose of acquiring a rubber estate in the Philippines, issued a prospectus in which was quoted a report on the natural advantages of the estate by one of the directors, who was stated to be acquainted with the locality. The prospectus also bore that no portion of the price of the estate would be paid until the directors had received an independent report confirming the statements of the director. A shareholder, who had received the prospectus and had applied for and been allotted shares, brought an action against the company for removal of his name from the register of shareholders and for repayment of the price of the shares, on the ground that he had been induced to apply for them by the statements in the report quoted in the prospectus, which statements he averred were false and fraudulent. In defence it was maintained that the action was irrelevant, the directors having in the prospectus not only not vouched for, but expressly refrained from committing themselves to the truth of the statements made in the report. Held (rev. judgment of the First Division, reported p. 183) that the action was relevant in respect that, the prospectus having been put forward by the company as an inducement to take shares, the company could not take benefit from the false and fraudulent statements of their agent. a number of persons. The project of forming the syndicate having failed, the partners floated a limited company, proposed to the depositors that their deposits should be applied in taking shares, and offered to each of them a number of shares in proportion to, but of a greater face value than, the amount of his deposits. The company having gone into liquidation, one of the depositors, who had been allotted shares and had received from the company share certificates which bore that the shares allotted to him were fully paid, though in fact they were not, was sued by the liquidators for the price of his shares. Circumstances in which held (by the Lord Ordinary, Cullen) that as the defender had accepted the shares in bona fide reliance on the statements in the certificates, the company were barred from maintaining that the shares were not fully paid, and defender assoltized. Penang Foundry Company, Limited, v. Gardiner, p. 1203.

Shares—"Paid-up share capital"—Shares issued for a consideration other than cash or the equivalent of cash—Shares issued at a discount—Railway—Contractors' line.

3. For the purpose of authorising them to construct a railway, the promoters of the Newburgh and North Fife Railway Company obtained an Act of Parliament, which incorporated the Companies Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, the Companies Clauses Act, 1863, and Acts amending the same. A Schedule to the Act contained an agreement between the Company and the North British Railway Company, whereby the North British Company guaranteed a fixed dividend upon "the paid-up share capital" of the Newburgh Company. The Newburgh Company, having failed to obtain sufficient subscriptions to its shares, entered into an agreement with a syndicate, whereby the Company undertook to issue to the syndicate its whole unissued capital, and the syndicate undertook to construct the railway. It was established by proof that the cost of construction was about 60 per cent of the face value of the capital issued to the syndicate, and that the syndicate disposed of the shares so issued at less than par. Held that the capital so issued to the syndicate was not "paid-up share capital" of the Newburgh Company in the sense of the agreement with the North British Company, and that the North British Company was only bound to contribute to the dividend on so much of the capital of the Newburgh Company as was issued in consideration of cash or the equivalent of cash. Opinions that a company incorporated under the Companies Clauses Acts is not entitled to issue its original shares at a discount: Question whether such a company is entitled to issue shares for a consideration other than cash or the equivalent of cash. Newburgh and North Fife Railway Company v. North British Railway Company, p. 1166.

CONTRACT. Breach—Damages for delay—Measure of damages—Provision for liquidate damages for delay—Failure of contractor to complete contract—Completion of contract by other parties—Applicability of provision for liquidate damages.

1. A contract for the construction of certain works by a specified date contained a clause providing for liquidate damages at certain rates to be paid by the contractor for each week's delay beyond that date. A separate clause provided that, if the contractor should suspend the works, the employers might take possession of the plant and materials and engage others to complete the contract, and that, should the expenses thus properly incurred by the employers exceed the amount which would have been due to the contractor on completion of the work, the difference was to be paid by the latter to the former. The contractor became bankrupt and suspended the works, and the employers thereupon engaged other persons to complete them, but they were not completed until at least six weeks after the date specified in the original contract. Held that, while the employers were entitled to sue for damages for breach of contract, they could not found on the liquidate damages clause, as that clause applied only where the contractor had himself completed the contract. British Glanzstoff Manufacturing Co., Limited, v. General Accident, Fire, and Life Assurance Corporation, Limited, (H. L.) p. 1.

Breach—Rescission—Exclusion of arbitration clause by rescission of contract.

2. A contract between an insurance company and a firm of cattle salesmen, for the insurance of cattle sold by the firm, contained an arbitration clause providing that any dispute between the parties as to the construction of the contract should be referred to an arbitrator, and that "no action shall be maintainable against the insurers except upon" the award of such arbitrator. The insurers, having taken exception to certain actings of the firm, declined to do further business with them. The firm replied that they would continue to insure live stock on the insurer's account in terms of the contract. In an action of damages at the instance of the firm against the insurers for breach of contract, the question whether there had been breach of contract or not depended on the construction to be put upon a certain clause of the contract. The defenders maintained that the construction of this clause fell to be determined by arbitration before any action of damages could be maintained. Circumstances, in which held that the parties had not treated the contract as rescinded, and, accordingly, that the arbitration clause was still binding; and action sisted that the construction of the clause in dispute might be determined by arbitration. Hegarty & Kelly v. Cosmopolitan Insurance Corporation, Limited, p. 377.

CROWN. Volunteer forces—Liability of commanding officer for bank overdraft—Volunteer Act, 1863, sec. 25—Regulations for the Volunteer Force, 1901, Article 407—Contract—Bank.

In October 1906, on the instructions of the commanding officer of a volunteer regiment, an account was opened with a bank, headed.

CROWN—Continued.

"R.S.F. 2nd Volunteer Battalion, Finance Committee. Cheques to be signed by any two members of the Committee." The sums paid to the credit of the account consisted mainly of sums paid directly to the bank by the War Office, while the drafts upon the account were made by cheques stamped "On His Majesty's Service," and signed by two members of the finance committee, one of whom was as a rule, though not in every instance, the commanding officer. On the transference of the corps to the Territorial Force in 1908 there was a large debit balance on the account, for which the War Office and the County Association refused to accept liability. The bank having brought an action against the commanding officer for the amount of the overdraft, the Court assolized the defender, holding (1) that neither sec. 25 of the Volunteer Act, 1863, nor the Volunteer Regulations of 1901 (which vested the property of the regiment in the commanding officer), imposed any liability upon him for such a debt; (2) that it was not proved that he had as an individual entered into any contract with the bank which could infer personal liability against himself. National Bank of Scotland, Limited, v. Shaw, p. 133.

The agent of the objector moved for an adjournment in order that the claimant might be cited of new, but admitted that he was unable to state any change of circumstances with regard to the claim, or any new facts not before the Court when the claimant was formerly admitted. Held that the Sheriff was entitled, in the exercise of his discretion, to refuse the adjournment and admit the claim. *Melville v. ENTAIL. Improvement expenditure—Obligation by heir in possession to repay improvement expenditure undertaken by tenant of entailed subjects—Action by tenant's executors against succeeding heir in possession for repayment—Title to sue—Extent of liability of succeeding heir—Entail Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1878, sec. 1.

1. Sir A. M., an heir of entail in possession, granted a lease of the mansion-house and policies on the entailed estate, and entered into agreements with his tenant in terms of which the latter undertook to execute certain improvements upon the subjects let, Sir A. binding himself and the heirs of entail succeeding him (and subsidiarie his heirs, executors, and representatives whomsoever) to repay to the tenant, at the date of Sir A.'s death, a proportion of the certified cost of these improvements, the amount payable not to exceed a certain fixed sum. The tenant executed improvements, the certified cost of which exceeded the fixed sum, and predeceased Sir A. After the death of the latter the tenant's executors brought an action against the heir succeeding Sir A. in possession of the entailed estate in which, founding on sec. 1 of the Entail Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1878, they claimed payment from him of the whole of the fixed sum. Held (1) that the agreements in question created obligations to which sec. 1 of the Entail Amendment Act of 1878 applied, and which were accordingly, under that section, binding on the succeeding heir of entail to the extent to which Sir A., if he had himself made the improvements and had survived, could have charged them upon the estate ; (2) that the pursuers had a good title to sue the defender directly and to recover from him a sum equal to that which Sir A. could have charged upon the estate ; (3) that the sum was one representing three-fourths of the value, as at Sir A.'s death, of such of the improvements as were chargeable on the estate under the Entail Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1875. Shepherd's Executors v. Mackenzie, p. 144.

Improvement expenditure—Petition to charge—Competency—Obligation by heir in possession to repay improvement expenditure incurred by tenant—Competency of petition to charge at instance of tenant's executors—Entail Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1875, sec. 11—Entail Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1878, sec. 1.

2. An heir of entail in possession granted a lease of the mansion-house and policies on the entailed estate, and entered into agreements with his tenant in terms of which he bound himself and the heirs of entail in succession to him (and subsidiarie his heirs, executors, and representatives whomsoever) to repay, at the date of his death, certain expenditure which the tenant undertook to incur on improvements of the subjects let. In security of this obligation, and "to ensure the fulfilment of the same by the heirs of entail succeeding him," he bequeathed and assigned to the tenant and the tenant's executors the amount which was stipulated to be repaid. After the heir and the tenant were both dead the executors of the latter presented a petition, under sec. 11 of the Entail Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1875, for authority to charge upon the estate the improvement expenditure which the tenant had incurred. Held that, as the petitioners did not represent an heir of entail who had executed or paid for the improvements, the petition was incompetent. Shepherd's Executors v. Mackenzie, p. 144.

Provisions to younger children—Free rent—Deductions—Interest on debt—Interest on estate-duty—Finance Act, 1894, secs. 6 (8) and 9 (1).

3. By a deed of entail power was conferred upon the successive heirs of entail in possession to make provisions for widows by way of annuities, not exceeding a certain proportion of the free rents of the estate to be computed "after deduction of all annual public and parochial burdens and interests of debts and provisions affecting the same at the time"; also to make provisions for younger children, not exceeding a certain number of years' free rent of the estate, the rent "to be computed and taken as at the date of the deed granting the provisions, after deduction of all annual public and parochial burdens affecting the same at the time," no mention being made of interest of debts as a deduction. An heir of entail, on succeeding to the estate, made provisions for younger children, the deed of provision being executed before the date arrived when, under the Finance Act, 1894, payment of certain estate-duties due in respect of the estate could actually be demanded. Held that in estimating the "free rent" for the purposes of the provisions to younger children there fell to be deducted: (1) Interest on debts affecting the estate, in respect that "free rent" meant rent free from such interest, and that this was not affected by the fact that in the deed of entail interest on debt was not specifically mentioned as a deduction with regard to such provisions. (2) Interest on estate-duty, in respect that, although the estate-duty was not actually payable till after the date of the deed creating the provision, it was already an existing statutory burden on the estate. *Mackintosh v. Incidence of debts—Liability of heritable bonds for debts—Debt secured on particular subjects—Succession—Jus Relictæ—Debts chargeable against jus relictæ fund.

2. A bond, which was moveable quoad the creditor's succession but heritable quoad his widow's jus relictæ, was assigned by him to a bank in security of advances. Held (1) that, in a question with his widow claiming jus relictæ, the ordinary moveable debts of the deceased were chargeable solely against the fund available for jus relictæ, no portion of them being chargeable against the bond; but (2) that advances made by the bank on the security of the assignation formed a charge against the bond. Heath v. Grant's Trustees, p. 78.

1. During the course of an action for interdict of a nuisance the existence of the nuisance was established, and the defenders then executed certain remedial measures, which, however, the pursuers maintained had been unsuccessful. The Court thereupon remitted the matter to a man of skill, who reported that the nuisance had been effectually removed. Circumstances in which the Court allowed the defenders the expenses of the remit. M'Ewen v. 4. In an action of damages for slander, in which the pursuer refused a tender of £5 made prior to the closing of the record, the jury found for the pursuer and awarded him 6d. of damages on each of the three issues submitted to them. Held that the fact that the jury had returned a verdict for the pursuer and had awarded him damages, although merely nominal, excluded a motion made by the defenders for their expenses prior to the date of tender. Bradley v. Menley & James, Limited, p. 923.

Several defenders—Liability of unsuccessful defender for expenses of successful defender.

5. A tenement of houses was let by its proprietor to a company, and the individual houses of the tenement were sublet by the company to various subtenants. In an action originally brought against the company for damages in respect of an accident alleged to have been caused by a defect in the railings of an outside common stair leading to two of the houses, the pursuer afterwards called the proprietor as an additional defender owing to a statement in the company's defences that the proprietor was the person responsible for the condition of the outside portions of the premises. Taxation—Fees to counsel—Statements prepared for use of counsel.

8. In a complicated action with regard to the maintenance, reconstruction, and hiring of railway wagons, the proof lasted twelve days, and there were two adjournments, each of some months' duration. The successful party having obtained decree with expenses, the Court allowed (1) fees of twenty-five guineas to senior counsel for the first day of the proof and for the first day's resumption of the proof after each adjournment; (2) charges for tabulated statements, prepared for the use of counsel, of facts and figures compiled from the books and other documents in process. Hurst, Nelson, & Co., Limited, v. Spenser Whatley, Limited, p. 101.

Taxation—Fees to counsel in Sheriff Court—Interlocutor of Sheriff incidentally allowing fees recalled on appeal to Court of Session and expenses awarded—Right of Auditor to allow fees.

9. The allowance of fees to counsel made by the Sheriff in the interlocutor in which he answered the questions of law in a stated case held to warrant the Auditor in allowing counsel's fees in the Sheriff Court to the party found entitled to expenses on appeal to the Court of Session, although the Court of Session had recalled the Sheriff's interlocutor. Taylor v. Steel-Maitland, p. 978.

Taxation—Fees to witness—Fees to local agent acting as witness.

10. Fees as an ordinary witness allowed to a successful party's Glasgow agent. Hurst, Nelson, & Co., Limited, v. Spenser Whatley, Limited, p. 101.

Taxation—Sheriff Court expenses awarded on appeal in Court of Session—Scale of taxation—Time for determination of scale—C. A. S., 1913, M. ii.

11. The C. A. S., 1913, M. ii., provides that, in actions for damages in the Sheriff Court, expenses shall be taxed on a higher or a lower scale according to whether or not the sum decerned for exceeds £50, unless the Sheriff shall direct otherwise. In an action of damages in the Sheriff Court the pursuer was awarded £100, but on appeal to the Court of Session that sum was reduced to £50 with expenses. The Auditor of the Court of Session having taxed the Sheriff Court expenses on the lower scale, held that he was right, and observed that, if the pursuer desired taxation on the higher scale, he should have moved for an instruction to the Auditor to FRAUD. Forgery—Adoption—Agent and client—Fraud of agent—Adoption by client—Personal objection.

The proprietrix of certain subjects handed the title-deeds thereof to her law-agent, a nephew, at whose death it was discovered that he had utilised the title-deeds to obtain money for himself by means of a forged bond over the property. Previously the proprietrix had received a demand for payment of income-tax on "interest" and, not knowing to what such a demand could refer, she asked another nephew, a brother of the law-agent, to make inquiries, in the course of which he learnt that his brother had obtained money for himself on the security of his aunt's title-deeds. He refrained from communicating this to his aunt till after his brother's death, when she heard of the bond for the first time and at once repudiated her signature. In an action by her against the bondholders for reduction of the bond as a forgery and for delivery of the title-deeds, held that the knowledge of the nephew employed to make inquiries, which he had refrained from communicating, could not be imputed to the pursuer so as to bar her from subsequently repudiating the forgery; and decree granted as concluded for. Question, per the Lord President, whether the doctrine of adoption by "bar" can ever be applied where the knowledge of the person alleged to be barred is merely constructive knowledge. Muir's Executors v. Craig's Trustees, p. 349.

FRIENDLY SOCIETY. Exclusion of Court's jurisdiction—Rule of friendly society for settlement by arbitration of disputes between society and members—Election of member to board of management contrary to rule—Declarator that election void—Competence of action—Friendly Societies Act, 1896, secs. 9 (3), 68 (1), First Schedule (8).

In an action by a member of a friendly society against the society for declarator that the appointment of another member to the board of management was void in respect that under the rules of the society he was ineligible for election, it was pleaded that the action was excluded by a rule of the society that "all disputes between the society and any member as such . . . may be determined by arbitration." The rule was passed under the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, which provides that every dispute between a member and the society shall be decided in manner directed by the rules of the society "without appeal, and shall not be removable into any Court of law." Held that the action was competent in respect that the jurisdiction of the Court was not excluded in a case where the averment was that the society had acted in violation of its rules and constitution. *M'Gowan v. 2. In an action of divorce for adultery an alleged paramour, who has not been called as a defender and against whom there are no direct conclusions, but to whom the action has been intimated in terms of the Act of Sederunt of 17th July 1908 and who has appeared and been sisted to defend, is entitled to a decision as to his guilt or innocence. Raeside v. Raeside, p. 60.

Divorce for adultery—Reduction of decree—Competency—Reduction on ground of no jurisdiction at instance of creditors of divorced spouse.

3. The trustee on the bankrupt estate of a husband divorced in the Court of Session, desiring to recover certain marriage-contract funds which, as a result of the divorce, had become payable to the wife, brought an action for reduction of the decree of divorce on the ground that, the husband being a domiciled Englishman, the Court which pronounced the decree had no jurisdiction. The action of divorce had been undefended, and, although brought after the date of the husband's bankruptcy, had not been intimated to the trustee. *Held that the action of reduction was competent, in respect that the pursuer was not attacking the decree on its merits, but was merely maintaining that, having been pronounced by a Court having no jurisdiction, it was of no effect; but observed that his better course would have been to bring a petitory action against the marriage-contract trustees and challenge the decree of divorce ope exceptionis in that action. 1. In a petition under the Assurance Companies Act, 1909, for sanction of the transfer of the business of a life insurance company to another insurance company, the petitioners craved the Court to dispense with the transmission of the documents specified in sec. 13 of the Act to the policy-holders of the transferee company, who numbered 30,000, in respect that the life insurance funds of the transferee company would not, under the transfer, become liable for the sums due under the policies of the transferring company, and that the transmission would cause considerable trouble and expense. The Court dispensed with the transmission of the documents. City of Glasgow Life Assurance Co., p. 999.

National Insurance—Employment—Contract of service—Medical staff of infirmary—Master and servant—National Insurance Act, 1911, sec. 1 (1) and (2), and First Schedule, Part 1 (a).

2. Held that persons appointed to act in an infirmary (1) as resident physicians and resident surgeons; (2) as non-resident house physicians, non-resident house surgeons, and clinical assistants; and (3) as supervisors of the administration of anæsthetics, were not persons employed within the meaning of the National Insurance Act, 1911, in respect that, as the managers of the infirmary had no control over the manner in which these members of the staff carried out their treatment of the patients, no contract of service existed between them. Scottish Insurance Commissioners v. Edinburgh Royal Infirmary, p. 751.

National Insurance—Rates of contributions—Determination by Commissioners—Competency of reducing determination—National Insurance Act, 1911, sec. 66 (1).

3. The National Insurance Act, 1911, enacts, by sec. 66 (1) (c), that questions as to the rates of contributions to be paid by an employer and his employee respectively shall be determined by the Commissioners. An appeal is provided with regard to certain determinations of the Commissioners, but not with regard to their determinations under sec. 66 (1) (c). The Court dismissed an action for the reduction of a determination by the Commissioners under this subsection, holding that, in the absence of averments that they had acted ultra vires, the Court had no jurisdiction to interfere with their decision. *Don Brothers, Buist, & Co., Limited, v. INTERDICT. Property in soda-water bottles—Participation in illegal use of property.

An aerated water manufacturer sought to interdict a drysalter from putting paraffin oil into bottles belonging to the pursuer. The pursuer averred that bottles belonging to him, and marked with his name, were lent by him to his customers in the course of his trade, and were brought to the defender by persons coming to purchase paraffin oil, and that at their request the defender put paraffin oil into the bottles, in the knowledge that the bottles were the property of the pursuer and that the pursuer objected to such a practice since it injured them for use in his business. Held that the pursuer had relevantly averred participation by the defender in a wrongful use of the pursuer's property, which, if proved, would form a good ground for interdict against him; and proof allowed. Wilson v. Shepherd, p. 300.

INTEREST. Entail—Obligation by heir in possession to repay improvement expenditure undertaken by tenant of entailed subjects—Decree in favour of tenant's executors against succeeding heir in possession for repayment.—Interest.

1. Sir A. M., an heir of entail in possession, granted a lease of the mansion-house and policies on the entailed estate, and entered into agreements with his tenant in terms of which the latter undertook to execute certain improvements upon the subjects let, Sir A. binding himself and the heirs of entail succeeding him (and subsidiarie his heirs, executors, and representatives whomsoever) to repay to the tenant, at the date of Sir A.'s death, a proportion of the certified cost of these improvements, the amount payable not to exceed a certain fixed sum. The tenant executed improvements, the certified cost of which exceeded the fixed sum, and predeceased Sir A. After the death of the latter the tenant's executors, founding on sec. 1 of the Entail Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1878, brought an action against the heir succeeding Sir A. in possession of the entailed estate in which they obtained decree for a sum equal to that which Sir A. could have charged upon the estate. Held that, as the defender was not in delay in paying until the sum due by him had been proved, interest on the sum decerned for should run only from the date of decree. Shepherd's Executors v. Mackenzie, p. 144.

Rate where trustees personally liable.

2. Circumstances in which the representatives of a trustee, who were found liable to refund to the trust-estate a sum of money which had been lost through his negligence, were ordained to pay interest thereon at the rate of three and a half per cent. Lees's Trustees v. Dun, (H. L.) p. 12.

ISSUE. Illegal apprehension "without reasonable grounds of suspicion" —Malice and want of probable cause.

1. In an action of damages for wrongous arrest brought against two Glasgow constables who had apprehended the pursuer without a warrant, the defenders maintained that, as they had bona fide suspected the pursuer of a crime and as, in their judgment, their grounds of suspicion were reasonable, they were protected by section 88 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, which empowers constables to arrest without warrant persons "reasonably suspected of having committed" a penal offence. Held that malice and want of probable cause need not be put in issue: and an issue whether the defenders "wrongfully and illegally, and without reasonable grounds of suspicion, apprehended the pursuer," approved. Shields v. Shearer, p. 1012.

Verdict—Latitude of time—"On or about".

2. In an action of damages for slander the issue submitted to the jury was whether "on or about 12th March 1912" the defender at or near a shop occupied by the pursuer and in presence and hearing of one of the pursuer's neighbours had made a slanderous statement concerning the pursuer which imported that he was a thief. The jury having found that the slander had been uttered by the defender at the place and in the circumstances set forth in the issue but that it had been so uttered in February 1912 the Lord President directed that the verdict should be entered for the defender. Smith v. Paton, p. 1203.

JUDICIAL FACTOR. Powers—Power to grant lease of urban subjects—Application for special powers.

Apart from special circumstances it is unnecessary for a judicial factor who desires to grant a lease of urban subjects to apply to the Court for authority to do so, the granting of such a lease, if the approval of the Accountant of Court has been obtained, being within his ordinary powers of administration. Observations, per the Lord President, on the meaning of an application by a judicial factor for special powers. Tosh's Judicial Factor, p. 242.

JURISDICTION. Arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa—Action for delivery of goods in terms of contract and failing delivery for damages—Foreign—Contract.

1. Held that jurisdiction in an action concluding for delivery of goods in terms of a contract between the parties, and failing delivery for damages was competently founded by arrestments ad fundandam jurisdictionem. Union Electric Co., Limited, v. Holman & Co., p. 954.

Exclusion of jurisdiction—Rule of friendly society for settlement by arbitration of disputes between society and members.

2. Held, in an action by a member of a friendly society against the society, that the jurisdiction of the Court was not excluded by a rule of the friendly society for the settlement of disputes between the society and its members by arbitration, in respect that the pursuer's averment was that the society had acted in violation of its rules and constitution. M'Gowan v. City of Glasgow Friendly Society, p. 991.

Exclusion of jurisdiction by statutory remedy—National Insurance Act, 1911, sec. 66 (1).

3. The National Insurance Act, 1911, enacts, by section 66 (1) (c), that questions as to the rates of contributions to be paid by an employer and his employee respectively shall be determined by the Commissioners. An appeal is provided with regard to certain determinations of the Commissioners, but not with regard to their determinations under sec. 66 (1) (c). The Court dismissed an action for the reduction of a determination by the Commissioners under this subsection, holding that, in the absence of averments that they had acted ultra vires, the Court had no jurisdiction to interfere with their decision. Don Brothers, Buist, & Co., Limited, v. Scottish Insurance Commissioners, p. 607.

Petition for access to children where spouses have foreign domicile—Expenses—Parent and child—Husband and wife.

4. In an action at the instance of a husband for divorce on the ground of his wife's desertion, the Lord Ordinary repelled a plea of no jurisdiction and granted decree. Thereupon the wife, who resided in England, presented a petition for access to the minor children of the marriage, whose residence was with their father in Scotland. While the petition was still pending, the Court, on a reclaiming note, recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor in the action of divorce and sustained the plea of no jurisdiction, on the ground that the husband's domicile was English. Thereafter they dismissed the petition for access, holding that it followed from the previous decision that they had no jurisdiction to entertain it; but allowed the wife her expenses in the petition, on the ground that, at the time she presented it, she was entitled to do so. *Barkworth v. 1. Held that in proceedings under the Prevention of Crime Act, 1908 the evidence of a police officer that an accused person had, after his apprehension, stated his age to be forty-four, was not, without corroboration, sufficient proof of the accused's age; and a verdict of habitual criminality obtained on that evidence alone as to age recalled. *M'Court v. Statutory offences—Betting—Use of rooms for the receipt of money for purposes of betting—Betting Acts, 1853, secs. 1 and 3, and 1874, sec. 4.

3. An accused was charged with contravening the Betting Acts by keeping a room at one address and a room at another address "for the purpose of money . . . being received . . . as the consideration for an undertaking . . . to pay thereafter money on events . . . relating to games. . . ." He was found guilty as libelled. Held that the conviction was good, although all the money was received and all the correspondence relating to bets was conducted at one room, while the other was used exclusively for settling up accounts. Hodgson v. Macpherson, (J.) p. 68.

Statutory Offences—Betting—Betting-house—Search of suspected houses—Warrant for seizure of documents—Postal orders—Admissibility as evidence—Betting Act, 1853, sec. 11.

4. Held that a search warrant granted under sec. 11 of the Betting Act, 1853, authorising a constable to seize "all lists, cards, or other documents relating to betting" found in certain premises suspected of being kept as a betting-house, covered postal orders, and that postal orders seized thereunder were admissible as evidence in a case where a person was charged with being the keeper of the betting-house. *Hodgson v. Statutory Offences—Betting—Sending postcards inviting to bet—Jurisdiction of Sheriff in Sheriffdom where cards received—Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908, sec. 10 (4).

Statutory Offences—Brothel—Keeping a brothel—Jurisdiction—Whether charge triable by a single magistrate—Sentence—Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, sec. 13—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, secs. 403 and 431.

6. Held that a charge of keeping a brothel contrary to sec. 13 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, may be tried under sec. 431 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, before a single police magistrate; and that the magistrate is entitled to impose on the accused, if found guilty, a sentence of imprisonment for three months. Observed that proceedings for the offence of keeping a brothel may also be taken under sec. 403 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, which provides for trial before the Sheriff, or two police magistrates, and limits the sentence of imprisonment to one of sixty days. *M'Laren v. 8. The Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1908, enacts, sec. 1 (1), that a workman shall not be below ground for more than eight hours during any consecutive twenty-four, but (2) that no contravention of this provision shall be deemed to take place in the case of any workman who is below ground for the purpose inter alia of meeting any danger or apprehended danger. Held that "danger" was limited to danger arising out of some abnormal occurrence, and accordingly that workmen engaged on a Sunday night and Monday morning in repairing falls, such as were expected to occur, and normally did occur, every week when the pit was idle between Saturday and Monday, did not fall within the exception. Thorneycroft v. Archibald, (J.) p. 45.

Statutory Offences—Coal mine—Maximum period of consecutive underground employment—Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1908, sec. 1 (1) (2) and (7)—Workmen working in shifts—Applicability of provisions to firemen.

9. Held that the provisions of sec. 1, subssecs. 1 and 2 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1908, which enact that a workman shall not be underground for more than eight hours in any consecutive twenty-four with a certain modification in the case of workmen working in "shifts," apply to firemen with the substitution in their case of nine and a half hours in each subsection for eight hours. Observed that the question whether men are working in shifts or not is a question of fact for the Judge who tries the case, and is to be determined on a strict view of the definition of a shift contained in sec. 1 of the Act. Roger v. Stevenson, (J.) p. 30.

Statutory Offences—Coal mine—Regulations for safety of miners—"Mechanical haulage"—Whether expression applicable to haulage worked by gravity—Coal Mines Act, 1911, sec. 46 (4).

10. Held that a system of haulage in use in a mine by which an empty tub was drawn up an incline by the weight of a loaded tub descending on a parallel set of rails and attached to the empty tub by a chain passing round a pulley situated at the top of the incline, was not a system of "mechanical haulage" in the sense of sec. 46 (4) of the Coal Mines Act, 1911, and that accordingly the mine-owners were not bound to provide certain safeguards which under the section were compulsory "on every haulage road where mechanical haulage . . . is used." Soutar v. Reid, (J.) p. 84.

Statutory Offences—Fortune-telling—Jurisdiction—Magistrate in Burgh Police Court—Vagrancy Act, 1824, sec. 4—Prevention of Crime Act, 1871, secs. 15 and 17.

11. By the Vagrancy Act, 1824, which applies only to England, it is made an offence, under sec. 4, to profess to tell fortunes by palmistry with intent to deceive. The Prevention of Crime Act, 1871, enacts, sec. 15, that the provisions of the section above mentioned "as amended by this section, shall be in force in Scotland," and sec. 17, that "any offence against this Act" may be prosecuted before a Court of summary jurisdiction. Held that the expression in the latter section "any offence against this Act" did not apply exclusively to offences contained in the body of the Prevention of Crime Act, but included offences against sec. 4 of the Vagrancy Act, and that accordingly a magistrate sitting in a Burgh Police Court had jurisdiction to try a charge of professing to tell fortunes by palmistry with intent to deceive. Gerald v. M'Intyre, (J.) p. 59.

Statutory Offences—Game—Dealing in game without licence—Time within which prosecution may be brought—Game Licences Act, 1860, secs. 3, 13, 14—Game Act, 1831, sec. 41—Excise Act, 1848, sec. 3.

12. Held that prosecutions for dealing in game without a licence in contravention of the Game Licences Act, 1860, and for the recovery of the penalties imposed by the Act, are timeously brought if instituted within six months of the alleged offences. M'Lean v. Johnston, (J.) p. 1.

Statutory Offences—Game—Trespass in pursuit of game—Retrieving dead or wounded game—Game (Scotland) Act, 1832, sec. 1.

13. Held that where a rabbit after being shot on the public road ran into private ground and there fell dead or moribund, the shooter, in sending his dog into the private ground to retrieve it, did not commit a trespass "in search or pursuit of" game within the meaning of sec. 1 of the Game (Scotland) Act, 1832. Nicoll v. Strachan, (J.) p. 18.

Statutory Offences—Game—Trespassing in pursuit of game or rabbits—Complaint—Relevancy—Alternative charge—Game (Scotland) Act, 1832, sec. 1—Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908, sec. 18, and Schedule C.

14. Held that a complaint brought under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908, charging an accused with trespassing in pursuit of "game or rabbits," contrary to the Game (Scotland) Act, 1832, sec. 1, was relevant, and not open to the objection that it libelled alternative charges. Morrison v. Anderson, (J.) p. 114.

Statutory Offences—Motor car—Charge of driving "recklessly or negligently"—Motor Car Act, 1903, sec. 1—Complaint—Relevancy—General conviction on alternative charges.

15. The driver of a motor car was charged on a summary complaint with driving his car "recklessly or negligently," whereby it collided with another car, contrary to the Motor Car Act, 1903, sec. 1. The accused was found "guilty as libelled." Held that the complaint was irrelevant, in respect that, not being in the form provided by the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908, Schedule C, it contained alternative charges without adequate specification; and that a general conviction following on such charges was bad. Observed (per the Lord Justice-Clerk) that while it is open to a prosecutor to select one or other of the wrongous ways of driving mentioned in the Motor Car Act, or to charge more than one of them cumulatively, he cannot insert them disjunctively in a complaint and charge the accused generally with driving in one or other of these wrongous ways. Connell v. Mitchell, (J.) p. 13.

Statutory Offences—Patent—Patents and Designs Act, 1907, sec. 84—Unregistered person describing himself as patent agent—Complaint—Instance—Private prosecutor—Title to prosecute—Expenses—Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908, sec. 52.

16. The Chartered Institute of Patent Agents has an interest, and therefore a title, to prosecute, with the concurrence of the procurator-fiscal, a summary complaint charging an accused with contravening the Patents and Designs Act, 1907, sec. 84, by describing himself as a patent agent without being registered; and, as the Institute in such proceedings is not "prosecuting in the public interest," expenses may be awarded to it in terms of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908, sec. 52. Lockwood v. Chartered Institute of Patent Agents, (J.) p. 8.

Statutory Offences—Patent—Patents and Designs Act, 1907, sec. 84—Unregistered person describing himself as patent agent—Person calling himself "British and Foreign" patent agent.

17. The Patents and Designs Act, 1907, sec. 84, prohibits under a penalty any person from describing himself as a patent agent unless he is registered as such agent in pursuance of the Act; and provides that "in this section 'patent agent' means exclusively an agent for obtaining patents in the United Kingdom." Held that a person who, without being registered, had used the title of "British and Foreign" patent agent, had described himself as a patent agent within the meaning of the section; and accordingly was guilty of a contravention thereof. Lockwood v. Chartered Institute of Patent Agents, (J.) p. 8.

Statutory Offences—Places of refreshment—Keeping open contrary to bye-law—Ice-cream shops—Respective powers of town and county councils to make bye-laws and impose penalties—Burgh—County—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, secs. 316 and 317—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903, secs. 82 and 97—Burgh Police (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1911, sec. 1—Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, sec. 57.

18. Held that, whereas under the Burgh Police (Scotland) Acts, 1892, 1903, and 1911, town-councils are empowered to make bye-laws in regard to the hours of opening and closing ice-cream shops and other places of public refreshment in burghs, and to impose a penalty for each breach not exceeding forty shillings, county councils under the same Acts and under the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, are empowered to make like bye-laws for counties, but to impose a penalty not exceeding five pounds. Lena v. Davidson, (J.) p. 76.

Statutory Offences—Places of refreshment—Keeping open contrary to bye-law—Complaint—Form of complaint—Specification of purposes for which kept open.

19. A bye-law of a county council made it an offence to keep premises open later than an hour specified. Held that a complaint which simply set forth that the accused kept his premises open after the hour specified contrary to the bye-law was relevant, and an objection that the purposes for which they were kept open ought to have been stated repelled. Lena v. Davidson, (J.) p. 76.

Statutory Offences—Revenue—Obstructing Revenue Officer—Inland Revenue Regulation Act, 1890, sec. 11—Complaint—Relevancy—Specification of statutes.

20. A licensed dealer in motor spirit was charged under a summary complaint which set forth that the accused did, contrary to the Inland Revenue Act, 1890, sec. 11, obstruct an officer of customs and excise in the execution of his duty by refusing to show him the motor spirit stock-book kept by the accused. The Sheriff-substitute having dismissed the complaint as irrelevant, in respect that the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, and relative regulations which deal with motor spirit were not libelled: Held that it was unnecessary to libel these; and that, as the section creating the offence and the manner in which the offence had been committed were set forth, the complaint was relevant. Tighe v. Wilson, (J.) p. 26.

Statutory Offences—Tramways—Refusal to pay tramway fare—Glasgow Corporation Tramways Acts—Breach of bye-laws of Glasgow Corporation—Complaint—Relevancy.

21. The bye-laws and regulations made by the Town-Council of Glasgow in terms of their Tramways Acts contain the following provisions: Bye-law No. 3 provides that every passenger shall pay his legal fare to the tramway conductor, but imposes no penalty for failure to do so. Bye-law No. 4 provides that any person evading or attempting to evade payment of his fare shall be liable to the penalties prescribed in these bye-laws. Bye-law No. 26 provides that any person committing a breach of the bye-laws shall be liable to a specified fine. A complaint charging the accused with failing or refusing to pay a tramway fare contrary to bye-law No. 3 was dismissed as irrelevant by the magistrate, on the ground that no offence was constituted by that bye-law, the only offence as to fares being evasion of payment under bye-law No. 4. Held that bye-law No. 3, read, as it must be, along with bye-law No. 26, constituted an offence, and that the complaint was relevant. M'Intyre v. M'Pherson, (J.) p. 21.

Statutory Offences—Truck Act, 1831, secs. 2, 3, and 23—Contract authorising retention of wages for sums to become due for occupation of house after right of occupation ceases—Master and Servant.

22. A company let to its employees houses for the period of their employment with the company. At each fortnightly pay-day the employees signed receipts for their wages, which contained a clause authorising the deduction of their house rent from their future wages, and also this clause:—"In the event of my leaving your employment I authorise you to retain whatever moneys are in your hands until I remove from your house." On 1st March 1912 the employees left the employment owing to a strike, and from the wages payable on that day the company, in virtue of the authority granted in the receipts signed on the preceding pay-day (16th February), withheld in the case of each employee a sum as against what might thereafter become due for the occupation of his house. Held that the contract of 16th February, and the retention of part of the wages on 1st March, were both illegal under the Truck Act, 1831. Summerlee Iron Co., Limited, v. Thomson, (J.) p. 34.

Complaint—Relevancy—Jurisdiction—Necessity of setting forth statute giving jurisdiction.

23. Held that it is unnecessary to set forth in a complaint the particular statutory enactment which gives jurisdiction to the Court which tries the accused. M'Laren v. Macleod, (J.) p. 61.

Complaint—Relevancy—Statutory offence—Specification of statutes—Inclusion of statutes creating different offence from offence charged—General conviction—Betting.

24. A bookmaker was tried on a complaint charging him with sending by post cards containing invitations to bet, "contrary to" certain specified sections of the Betting Act, 1853, which deal with the offence of owning, occupying, or advertising betting houses, and certain sections of the Betting Act, 1874, which deal with the offence of inviting to bet. He was found "guilty as libelled." The Court quashed the conviction, in respect that the sections of the Betting Act, 1853, libelled were not directed against the offence set forth in the complaint but against entirely different offences. Lipsev v. Mackintosh, (J.) p. 104.

Complaint—Latitude in time.

25. Observations (per the Lord Justice-Clerk) on the duty of a prosecutor to set forth special reasons to justify an exceptional latitude of time taken in an indictment. H. M. Advocate v. Mackenzie, (J.) p. 107.

Procedure—Bail—Refusal of bail—Charge of administering poison with intent to murder.

26. A person charged with administering poison with intent to murder presented a petition to be liberated on bail. The application was opposed by the prosecutor on the ground, inter alia, that the precognitions disclosed an aggravated case. The Sheriff-substitute having refused the petition, held, on appeal to the High Court of Justiciary, that the petition was rightly refused. H. M. Advocate v. Saunders, (J.) p. 44.

Procedure—Instance—Public or private prosecution—Statutory offence—National Insurance Act, 1911—Failure to pay contributions—Title of Commissioners to prosecute.

27. Held (in a case prior to the National Insurance Act, 1913) that the Scottish Insurance Commissioners, established under the National Insurance Act, 1911, had no title under that Act or otherwise to prosecute a complaint under sec. 69 (2) in respect of failure to pay contributions under the Act; and that the prosecution should have been at the instance of the public prosecutor. Observations on the various qualifications which in Scotland confer a right to prosecute, and in particular on the law regarding the implied grant by statute of such a power to private persons. Rintoul v. Scottish Insurance Commissioners, (J.) p. 120.

Procedure—Trial—Administration of Justice—Emergence of question of civil right—Prosecution under Game (Scotland) Act, 1832.

28. In a prosecution in the Sheriff Court for trespassing in pursuit of game or rabbits contrary to the Game (Scotland) Act, 1832, sec. 1, the question arose whether one of five joint tenants of a common pasturage had the right to authorise the accused to kill rabbits upon the land. Held that a question of civil right had emerged, and accordingly that the complaint fell to be dismissed. Morrison v. Anderson, (J.) p. 114.

Procedure—Indictment—Relevancy of indictment—Charge of stealing book containing trade secrets and making copies and appropriating secrets.

29. An indictment against a husband and wife charged the husband (1) with stealing between 3rd July 1907 and 2nd April 1913 a book of recipes of chemical secrets belonging to his employers, and (2) with making during the same period copies of the recipes with intent to dispose of them for profit in breach of an agreement of secrecy with his employers; and charged the wife with offering to dispose of these or other copies to the employers' trade rivals, in the knowledge that the copies had been fraudulently made by her husband, and with thus appropriating to her own profit trade secrets which were the exclusive property of the employers. Held with regard to the charges against her husband, that the first was relevant in respect that the taking of a book in order to copy its contents for an illegitimate purpose was theft, although there might be no intention to retain the book, but that the second was irrelevant as it merely charged the accused with the preparation for, and not with the perpetration of, a crime. Held further, that the charge against the wife being dependent on the second charge against the husband fell with it, and in any event was irrelevant in respect that it set forth no overt or accomplished criminal act. H. M. Advocate v. Mackenzie, (J.) p. 107.

Procedure—Objections—Noting of objections in the record—Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908, sec. 41.

30. Held that failure to note objections taken in the course of proceedings under a summary complaint, as provided for by sec. 41 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908, vitiates the whole proceedings following on the complaint. Question whether objections can be competently noted, not in the minutes of procedure, but by a reference in the minutes to a paper apart. Connell v. Mitchell, (J.) p. 13.

Procedure—Proof—Statements of panel—Voluntary statement to police officer.

person suspected of a crime, who has not been cautioned that what he says may be used against him, is not open to the same objections with regard to its admissibility as evidence against the accused as is a statement made by him in answer to questions put by the officer. Hodgson v. Macpherson, (J.) p. 68.

Procedure—Proof—Admissibility of evidence—Hearsay—Evidence of overheard conversations—Conversations part of res gestæ.

32. In a prosecution for keeping a house as a brothel the prosecutor examined as witnesses two policemen who repeated conversations overheard by them in the house in question. The accused objected to the evidence on the grounds that she was not present when the conversations took place, and that the persons whose conversations were overheard were not examined as witnesses. Held that the evidence was competent, in respect that it was not led to prove the truth of the matters stated in the conversations, but merely to prove the fact that such conversations took place. M'Laren v. Macleod, (J.) p. 61.

Procedure—Proof—Oppression—Sentence—Magistrate asking for information from person not witness in case before pronouncing sentence.

33. In a prosecution in the Police Court for reckless driving it was proved that a lorry driven by the accused had collided with a tramway car. After finding the accused guilty of the offence charged the magistrate inquired of the manager of the tramway company, who was present in Court but who had not been examined as a witness in the case, what was the amount of the damage done to the tramway car, and, after the manager had stated the amount, the magistrate fined the accused 30s. with the alternative of imprisonment for fifteen days. Conviction quashed on the ground that the information given by the manager was not competently before the magistrate, and that it was impossible to say that his mind might not have been affected thereby in fixing the penalty. Question whether the same result would have followed had the question been put to the prosecutor. Leavack v. Macleod, (J.) p. 51.

Sentence—Fine with alternative sentence of imprisonment for period exceeding statutory maximum—Alteration of sentence—Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908, secs. 48, 57.

34. An accused person was tried summarily by a Justice of Peace Court, and, on conviction, the presiding Justice intimated the sentence of the Court to be a fine of £1, with £1, 11s. of expenses, and in default of payment one month's imprisonment. The offender paid the fine, and he and certain of the Justices left the Court. Immediately thereafter, and before the sentence was recorded, it was noticed that under sec. 48 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908, the maximum period of imprisonment appropriate to the fine was only twenty days. The offender was recalled, and the same presiding Justice intimated to him that the sentence would be a fine of £1, with £1, 11s. of expenses, and, in default of payment, imprisonment for twenty days, and it was so recorded in the record of proceedings. Held that the sentence as recorded was not a new sentence, but was a correction of the sentence originally pronounced, which, as a mere executorial act, could, under the statute, be competently made by the presiding Justice in the absence of the other Justices who tried the cause, and suspension of the sentence refused. Renwick v. M'Dougall, (J.) p. 53.

Sentence—Statutory Offence—Increase in penalty by amending Act—Conviction of offence in period extending from before till after date of amending Act—Imposition of increased penalty—Amendment of sentence—Immoral Traffic (Scotland) Act, 1902, sec. 1 (1)—Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1912, sec. 7 (2)—Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908, sec. 75.

35. An accused was convicted of living on the earnings of prostitution contrary to the Immoral Traffic (Scotland) Act, 1902, and the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1912, the offence being libelled as having been committed between 1st October 1912 and 15th March 1913. Held, in a suspension, that a sentence of six months' imprisonment could not stand in respect that the offence might have been committed in whole or in part prior to 13th December 1912, the date at which the Act of 1912, which raised the penalty from three to six months, came into force; and sentence reduced, under the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908, sec. 75, to one of three months' imprisonment. Hall v. Macpherson, (J.) p. 100.

Sentence—Amendment of sentence—Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908, sec. 75.

36. The High Court having quashed a conviction, in respect that the sections of the Betting Act, 1853, libelled were not directed against the particular offence set forth in the complaint but against entirely different offences, held that this was not a case in which the Court should amend the conviction under sec. 75 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908. *Lipsey v. LEASE. Occupation—Tenant's duty to preserve subject let from injury—Duty to turn off water when leaving house empty.

1. Held that the tenant of a villa, who left it unoccupied for a month in winter without having either turned off the water and emptied the cisterns or informed the landlord of her intended absence, was liable to the landlord for damage caused by the bursting of the water-pipes owing to frost. Mickel v. M'Coard, p. 896.

Subjects—Market garden—Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908, secs. 29 (2), and 35 (1)—Varying portions of arable farm cultivated as market garden—Whether market garden in sense of Act.

2. Under a lease, dated May 1892, of a farm of 150 acres let "primarily as an agricultural subject" the tenant was "entitled to use all or so much of the land" as he might think proper for the purposes of a market garden, but subject to conditions including a condition as to rotation of crop, which permitted only two years' continuous cultivation of market-garden produce. The tenant annually kept 50 acres, but not always the same 50 acres, under cultivation as a market garden. Held that the fact that the ground cultivated had varied from time to time did not prevent the 50 acres under cultivation at the expiry of the lease from being a market garden within the meaning of sec. 29 of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1908, for the purpose of a claim for compensation for improvements. Taylor v. Steel-Maitland, p. 562.

Conditions—Restrictions as to rotation of crops—Market garden—Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908, secs. 23 (1), 35 (1).

3. Held that sec. 23 (1) of the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908, which provides, inter alia, that, notwithstanding the provisions of any lease respecting the method of cropping of arable lands, a tenant of a holding shall have full right to practise any system of cropping of the arable land on the holding, applies only to arable land, and that accordingly, where a farm was let primarily as an agricultural subject but with right to the tenant to cultivate such portion as he thought fit as a market garden, a condition permitting only two years' continuous cultivation of market-garden produce was valid. Taylor v. Steel-Maitland, p. 562.

Outgoing—Compensation for improvements—Market garden—Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908, sec. 29 (2)—“Written notice of dissent.”

4. In a claim by a tenant for compensation for improvements to land cultivated as a market garden (1) terms of a letter from the landlord's factor held to constitute a “notice of dissent” within the meaning of sec. 29 (2) of the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908, in so far as the improvements claimed for were in contravention of the lease; and (2) circumstances in which held that the tenant was entitled to compensation for rhubarb stools left in the ground at the termination of his tenancy, but only if and in so far as their cultivation had not been in contravention of the terms of the lease, and for a forcing-house erected by him, but only if and in so far as it constituted an improvement in connection with such a cultivation. Taylor v. Steel-Maitland, p. 562.

Outgoing—Compensation for improvements—Market garden—Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908, sec. 29 (2)—Improvements “then executed.”

5. The Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908, sec. 29 (2), which makes certain provisions with regard to improvements on market gardens, begins with these words:—“Where under a lease current on the first day of January 1898 a holding was at that date in use or cultivation as a market garden . . . and the tenant thereof has then executed thereon . . . any improvement . . .” Held that the word “then” means “thereafter.” Taylor v. Steel-Maitland, p. 562.

Small holdings—Statutory small tenant—Joint tenants—Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911, secs. 2 (1) (iii.) (b) and 26 (8).

6. Held that the provisions of sec. 32 of the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911, as to statutory small tenants applied to the case of a holding which at the commencement of the Act was held by joint tenants, and which continued to be held by the same tenants at the date of their application to the Land Court. Carmichaels v. Maccoll, p. 916.

Small holdings—Statutory small tenant—Right to renewal of lease on determination of tenancy—Application to Land Court to renew lease and fix rent—Objection that tenancy not determined owing to tacit relocation—Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911, sec. 32 (4).

7. In August 1912 a tenant in occupation of a holding, whose lease had expired at Whitsunday without notice of removal either on his part or on that of the landlord, applied to the Land Court as a statutory small tenant under the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911 (which came into operation in April 1912), for an order renewing his lease and fixing an equitable rent. The Land Court fixed the period of renewal as from Whitsunday 1912. In an appeal by special case the landlord contended that the Land Court could only renew the lease as from Whitsunday 1913, in respect that under sec. 32 (4) of the Act, renewal could only be granted “on any determination of the tenancy," and that in the present case the tenancy did not terminate until Whitsunday 1913, having been continued to that date by tacit relocation. Held that the determination of the Land Court was right, in respect that the Act itself, at the date when it came into operation, gave the tenant a right to a renewal of his tenancy at the expiry of his lease at Whitsunday 1912. Clyne v. Sharp's Trustees, p. 907.

Small holdings—Tenant from year to year—Application to Land Court by tenant who, before passing of Act, received notice to quit after Act came into operation—Competency—Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911, sec. 2 (1) (ii.).

8. A yearly tenant in possession of a holding at 1st April 1912, when the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911, came into operation, had, before the passing of that Act, received notice to remove at Whitsunday 1912. In an application by him to the Land Court for an Order fixing the rent and the period of renewal of his tenancy, Held that the service of the notice of removal did not exclude the application as incompetent. Morison's Trustees v. Grant, p. 919.

Game—Ground game—Right of a tenant in common to give authority to kill rabbits—Ground Game Act, 1880.

9. Question whether the common law right of the tenant of a farm verbally to authorise another to kill rabbits for the preservation of his crops was available to a tenant of pasture ground common to several tenants; and opinion reserved upon the applicability of the Ground Game Act, 1880, to such a tenancy. Morrison v. Anderson, (J.) p. 114.

Wife of tenant of house on common stair injured owing to defect in stair—Title to sue landlord.

10. The wife of the tenant of a dwelling-house on a common stair brought an action of damages against the landlord for injuries sustained by her owing to the defective condition of the stair. The defender pleaded that the pursuer had no title to sue, in respect that she was not a party to the contract of lease. Held (by the Lord Ordinary, Hunter) that the pursuer had a good title to sue, in respect that the stair was not included in the lease, but remained under the control of the landlord, who was bound to keep it reasonably safe for tenants and other persons using it as a means of access to the houses. *Mellon v. Held on a construction of the statutes that the Corporation were not bound, on the application of the holders, to redeem the stock at par at Whitsunday 1927, but had merely an option of so doing. British Linen Bank v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, (H. L.) p. 4.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT. County—Powers of county council—Regulation of places of public refreshment.

- A husband, by antenuptial contract of marriage, bound himself to pay to the trustees thereunder "before his death, at such times and in such sums as he finds it convenient," a sum of £4000, and, until it was paid over, to pay interest thereon to the trustees or to his wife. himself as an alimentary liferent provision for himself and the children of the marriage, and on the death of the survivor of the spouses to hold the sum for, or pay it over to, the children of the marriage. No part of the sum having been paid to the trustees, and the father having become bankrupt, the trustees claimed to be ranked as creditors for this sum in the bankruptcy. Held that, as the father had come under no obligation in favour of his children which involved his parting with the control of this sum, the children's right therein was not a jus crediti, but only a right of succession; and claim for the trustees rejected. *Mackinnon's Trustees v. MASTER AND SERVANT. Master's liability for servant's slander—Privilege—Sufficiency of averments of malice.

1. In an action of damages for slander, brought against a limited company owning a music hall, the pursuer averred that, while he was present at a performance in the hall, he was falsely accused by an attendant of indecent conduct towards a member of the audience. Held that the occasion was privileged, and that, as there was no sufficient averment of facts inferring malice, the action was irrelevant. *Gorman v. Master's liability for servant's slander—Privilege—Personal malice of servant.

2. An action of damages brought against a railway company on account of a verbal slander uttered by the manager of one of their station bars on a privileged occasion held irrelevant, in respect that the pursuer's averments disclosed that the malice alleged as actuating the slander was personal to the manager and in no way connected with the business of the defenders, and, accordingly, that the defenders could not be held responsible. *Aiken v. He was injured by an accident in the course of his employment, for which he agreed, without consulting his father, to accept compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906. After compensation had been paid for some time he brought an action of damages for his injury at common law, in which he averred that he had accepted the statutory compensation in ignorance of his common law claim; and contended that, being a minor, he was not bound by the agreement, and that, in any event, it should be reduced on the ground of minority and lesion. Held (1) that the pursuer's capacity as a minor to enter into the agree-

It was further proved, though denied by the defender, that the parties had connection at a subsequent date on which they admittedly met. Circumstances in which held, having regard in particular to the defender's false denial of the later act of connection and of the facts establishing it, that there was sufficient corroboration of the pursuer's testimony, and decree granted. *Florence v. PARTNERSHIP. Retirement of partner—Bonds and dispositions in security granted by partners—Duration of liability of retired partner—Bond of relief—Cautioner—Liberation.

An association, formed for the purpose of acquiring heritable properties as investments, in the course of their business borrowed sums of money on the security of certain of their properties, for which the partners in the association granted bonds and dispositions in security as trustees for the association, and also as individuals. One of the members thereafter withdrew from the association, under an article of the partnership agreement which permitted any member to retire on finding a satisfactory substitute, and the remaining members granted a bond of relief undertaking to relieve him of any claim made against him by any creditor in respect of the bonds. Neither the partnership agreement nor the bond of relief made any provision for the termination of obligations undertaken during his membership. Ten years after his withdrawal he brought an action against the members of the association to compel them, by paying up the amounts of the bonds or by obtaining discharges of his liability from the bondholders, to relieve him of all liabilities undertaken by him under the bonds. He founded his claim upon the long lapse of time, changes in the partnership, extension of the loans for further periods and their assignation to new creditors, and, separatim, upon the right which he contended he had as a mere cautioner at any time to withdraw his cautionary obligation as regarded future liability. Held that he was a principal debtor and not a cautioner, and had, in the circumstances, no right of relief against the defenders except that given by the bond of relief; and action dismissed as irrelevant. Roughhead v. White, p. 162.

In an action by a patentee for damages in respect of the sale of articles infringing his patent, the measure of damages may prima facie be taken to be the amount of profit which the pursuer would have obtained if he had himself effected the sales wrongfully effected by the defender. But the amount of damages so ascertained will be diminished if, and to the extent to which, it appears on a consideration of circumstances such as the nature of the trade, the area of its exercise, the volume of competition, and the defender's energy and skill in pushing trade upon the market, that the pursuer would not have effected these sales himself. Opinions (per Lord Dundas and Lord Salvesen) that there may be circumstances in which a pursuer may also fairly claim, as an item of damages, that he has been compelled, owing to the defender's illegal competition, to sell some of his patented articles at a lower price than formerly. Watson, Laidlaw, & Co., Limited, v. Pott, Cassels & Williamson, p. 762.

PERSONAL OBJECTION. Company—Shares issued as fully paid—Subsequent calls on liquidation.

1. Circumstances in which held that, as an allottee of shares had accepted the shares in bona fide reliance on statements in the certificates to the effect that the shares were fully paid, the company, having gone into liquidation, was barred from maintaining that the shares were not fully paid. Penang Foundry Company, Limited, v. Gardiner, p. 1203.

Negligence of original trustee—Action by assumed trustees—Alleged delay and contributory negligence of pursuers—Right to maintain action for behoof of beneficiaries.

2. Assumed trustees brought an action against the representatives of a deceased trustee for recovery of funds which they alleged had been lost to the trust-estate through his negligence. The defenders pleaded that the pursuers were barred by mora, and by the fact that they had themselves been guilty of negligence which had contributed to the loss. Held that, as the pursuers were suing as trustees for behoof of the beneficiaries whom they represented, the plea of bar stated against them was unavailing. Lees's Trustees v. Dun, (H. L.) p. 12.

Note of suspension—Offer of caution—Note passed on caution—Appeal on contention that note should be passed without caution.

3. The complainer in a note of suspension pleaded that the note should be passed without caution or consignment, but subsequently amended the note by adding an offer to find caution "if your Lordships shall so appoint." The Lord Ordinary then passed the

In September 1906 a workman obtained employment as a coal-heaver in the parish of A, which was not the parish of his birth settlement. In the summer of 1907, when his employment became slack, he left the parish and went into training with the militia and thereafter worked as an agricultural labourer. After an absence of nearly three months he returned to the parish of A and resumed his former employment. In the summer of 1908 he again absented himself for militia training and agricultural employment, his absence on this occasion lasting for over three months. He then returned to work in the parish of A, and remained there till June 1910, when he became chargeable as a pauper. Held that he had not "resided for three years continuously" in the parish of A in the sense of sec. 1 of the Poor Law (Scotland) Act, 1898, and accordingly had not acquired a residential settlement in that parish. Ayr Parish Council v. Wigtown Parish Council, p. 13.

It is incompetent for a procurator for the poor in the Sheriff Court, who is acting as agent for an applicant for the benefit of the poor's-roll, to act as a reporter on probabilis causa litigandi with regard to that application. M'Kean v. Herbison, p. 548.

PRESCRIPTION. Positive—Admissibility of referring to titles prior to title forming basis of prescription.

In a question of prescription it is not permissible to refer to titles prior to the title or series of titles which forms the basis of the prescription for the purpose of explaining away, or altering, or qualifying the investiture secured by prescription. Meacher v. Blair-Oliphant, p. 417.

PRESUMPTION. See Workmen's Compensation Act, 31.

PROCESS. Record—Amendment—Failure to pay opponent's expenses—Absolvitor or dismissal.

1. In an action of damages for personal injury brought in the Sheriff Court and remitted to the Court of Session for jury trial under sec. 30 of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907, the Second Division, on 15th November 1912, allowed the pursuer to amend his record, found the defenders entitled to the expenses connected with the amendment, and allowed the pursuer "to proceed in the cause only on payment" of the expenses found due. The pursuer having subsequently intimated that he did not intend to pay the expenses and proceed in the cause, the defenders moved for absolvitor. The pursuer maintained that the appropriate decree was one of dismissal. Decree of absolvitor granted. Dougall v. Caledonian Railway Co., p. 349.

Mandatory—Defender and Respondent in appeal abroad but within British Dominions.

2. The pursuer in an action of affiliation and aliment appealed to the Court of Session, and thereafter lodged a note in which she stated that "the defender and respondent has been out of the country for some weeks," and craved the Court to ordain him to find caution or to sist a mandatory. The Court in view of the facts that the respondent (1) had been assoilzied in the Sheriff Court, (2) had left the country bona fide for the purpose of his business, and (3) was within the jurisdiction of a Court of the British Dominions refused the prayer of the note hoc statu. Florence v. Smith, p. 393.

Reclaiming note—Competency—Timeous lodging of reclaiming note—Final interlocutor—Court of Session (Scotland) Act, 1850, sec. 11—Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 53.

3. An action reclaimed to the Inner House was settled by a joint minute in terms of which the Division pronounced an interlocutor decerning against the defenders for payment of a certain sum, finding the pursuers entitled to expenses up to and including the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, remitting the account thereof to the Auditor to tax and to report to the Lord Ordinary, and remitting the cause to his Lordship with power to decern for the taxed amount of the account. The Lord Ordinary thereafter pronounced an interlocutor in which he repelled objections by the pursuers to the Auditor's report, decerned against the defenders for the taxed amount of the account, and found the pursuers liable in the expenses of discussing the note of objections. A reclaiming note against this interlocutor held not to have been timeously lodged in respect that it had not been lodged within ten days, and refused. M'Alley v. Marshall's Trustees, p. 890.

Reclaiming note—Competency—Note of suspension—Offer of caution—Note passed on caution—Appeal on contention that note should be passed without caution.

4. The complainer in a note of suspension pleaded that the note should be passed without caution or consignment, but subsequently amended the note by adding an offer to find caution "if your Lordships shall so appoint." The Lord Ordinary then passed the note "on caution as offered." Held that the complainer was not barred by the offer of caution from reclaiming for the purpose of maintaining that the note should have been passed without caution. Cumming v. Hendry, p. 472.

Reclaiming note—Competency—Winding-up order pronounced by the Lord Ordinary on the Bills in vacation—Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, sec. 181.

5. It is competent to reclaim against an interlocutor pronounced by the Lord Ordinary on the Bills in vacation granting an order for the compulsory winding-up of a company. Magistrates of Edinburgh v. Union Billposting Co., Limited, p. 105.

Diligence for recovery of writs—Confidentiality—Letters by party's law-agents to arbiters and employees of party—Corresponding business-book entries.

6. In an action of suspension and interdict by a railway company against a quarrymaster, the question at issue being whether the freestone on a certain estate was a mineral, the respondent averred that more than sixty years before the present dispute had arisen the freestone was regarded and treated as a mineral by the complainers in claims and arbitration proceedings between them and the proprietors from whom they acquired the lands. A proof having been allowed, the respondent applied for a diligence to recover (1) letters from the complainers' law-agents to arbiters, engineers, contractors, and officials employed by, or acting on behalf of, the complainers in such claims and arbitrations, and tending to show whether the complainers regarded the freestone as a mineral or otherwise, and (2) entries in the business-books of the complainers' law-agents referring to the same transactions. Circumstances in which the Court granted the diligence, expressly reserving all questions of confidentiality. Caledonian Railway Co. v. Symington, p. 885.

Proof or jury trial—Averments of pursuer stating competent and incompetent grounds of action—Danger of jury being misled—Several pursuers—Non-community of interest.

7. In an action of damages brought against a doctor by the widow and children of a deceased miner the pursuers averred (1) that the defender had made an unauthorised post-mortem examination of the body of the deceased ; and (2) that, in consequence of the method in which it had been performed and of certain other actings of the defender, difficulty, delay, and expense had been incurred in prosecuting a claim under the Workmen's Compensation Act. Some of the pursuers were not persons entitled to compensation under the Act. Held that, while the action was competent (and was appropriate for jury trial) in so far as founded on the wrong done to all the pursuers jointly by the unauthorised post-mortem examination, it was incompetent in so far as founded on the second wrong which affected certain of them only ; and issue refused and case sent to trial before a Judge, in view of the likelihood of a jury confusing the competent and incompetent grounds of action. Hughes v. Robertson, p. 394.

Proof or jury trial—Action by workman for reduction of agreement to accept compensation, and for damages for injury.

8. A minor injured by an accident in the course of his employment, for which he agreed, without consulting his father, to accept compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, subsequently brought an action of damages for his injury at common law, in which he averred that he had accepted the statutory compensation in ignorance of his common law claim ; and contended that, being a minor, he was not bound by the agreement, and that, in any event, it should be reduced on the ground of minority and lesion. Held that the case was unsuitable for jury trial, and that the inquiry should be by a proof. M'Feetridge v. Stewarts & Lloyds, Limited, p. 773.

Jury trial—Transmission of cause for trial at sittings—Failure to lodge papers within time specified in Rolls of Court—Act of Sederunt, 19th November 1910, sec. 3.

9. A Lord Ordinary having on 20th February ordered a cause to be tried at the sittings, the agent responsible tendered the necessary papers to the Keeper of the Rolls on the afternoon of 5th March, but the Keeper refused to accept them, on the ground that, under a notice inserted in the Rolls of Court, midday of 5th March was the latest time at which they could be received. On a note for authority to the Keeper to receive the papers and include the cause among those to be taken at the sittings, the Court refused to grant that authority, but instead thereof discharged the Lord Ordinary's order, and remitted to him to proceed. Campbell v. Osborne & Hunter, p. 758.

PROCESS—Continued.Jury trial—Motion for new trial.

10. Circumstances in which the Court refused to set aside, on the ground of excess of damages, the verdict of a jury awarding £4000 to a farmer (the profit of whose farm amounted to about £350 a year) in respect of personal injuries sustained by him in a railway accident. Thoms v. Caledonian Railway Co., p. 804.

Jury trial—Motion for new trial—Entering judgment for party unsuccessful at trial—Jury Trials Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1910, sec. 2.

11. Circumstances in which, in an action for damages against a tramway company at the instance of a passenger who had been knocked down and injured by a car, the Court set aside a verdict for the pursuer and assoilzied the defenders, holding that, even on the assumption that the company's driver was to blame, the pursuer's evidence showed that the accident was due to her own negligence. Macleod v. Edinburgh and District Tramways Co., Limited, p. 624.

Jury trial—Verdict set aside and judgment entered for party unsuccessful at trial—Jury Trials Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1910, sec. 2.

12. Circumstances in which the Court, in an action of damages by an employee against his employer for wrongous information given to the police and slander, set aside the verdict of a jury on the ground that there was no evidence before the jury either of want of probable cause or of malice; and instead of allowing a new trial entered judgment for the defenders, in respect that all the relevant evidence which could be reasonably expected to be obtained was before them. Mills v. Kelvin & James White, Limited, p. 521.

13. In an action of divorce for adultery an alleged paramour, who has not been called as a defender and against whom there are no direct conclusions, but to whom the action has been intimated in terms of the Act of Sederunt of 17th July 1908 and who has appeared and been sisted to defend, is entitled to a decision as to his guilt or innocence. Circumstances in which the Lord Ordinary, while granting decree of divorce, assolizied an alleged paramour, thus appearing, from the conclusions of the summons so far as implicating him. Raeside v. Raeside, p. 60.

Petition—Advertisement—Company—Reorganisation of share capital—Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, sec. 45.

14. In a petition, under sec. 45 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, for confirmation by the Court of special resolutions passed by a limited company for reorganisation of its share capital, the Court ordered intimation of the petition without advertisement. Robert A. Munro & Co., Limited, p. 456, and British Assets Trust, Limited, p. 661.

Reduction—Necessity for reduction—Friendly Society—Election of member to board of management—Declarator that election void—Necessity for reduction of minutes of meeting at which election made.

15. The rules of a friendly society provided that members should be represented by delegates elected by themselves, and that minutes of the district meetings at which the election took place should be kept and transmitted to the secretary of the society. It was further provided that the delegates should elect from among themselves a board of management. Held that an action for declarator that the election of a member to the board of management was void, in respect that he was ineligible to act as a delegate, could competently be brought without reduction of the minutes of the meeting at which he was appointed a delegate, or of those of the meeting at which he was elected to the board. M'Gowan v. City of Glasgow Friendly Society, p. 991.

Appeal—Competency—Appeal against interlocutory judgment under Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, sec. 11—Leave to appeal—Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907, sec. 28.

16. Held that the provisions of sec. 28 of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907, apply to appeals in proceedings under the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876; and that, accordingly, an appeal by special case against a decision of the Sheriff repelling certain preliminary pleas in such proceedings was incompetent as, although the Sheriff had himself stated the special case, leave to appeal had not been formally obtained. Dumfries County Council v. Langholm Magistrates, p. 307.

Removal to Court of Session for jury trial—Refusal to remit back to Sheriff—Averments of substantial damage—Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907, sec. 30.

17. A Sheriff Court action for £300 as damages for injury to the pursuer's person and property having been remitted to the Court of Session under sec. 30 of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907, the Court refused to exercise the power given by that section of remitting the case back to the Sheriff, as the record disclosed that the alleged injuries were of a serious nature, and that the pursuer's claim was substantial. Mackie v. Davidson, p. 675.

Removal to Court of Session for jury trial—Remit to Sheriff—Trifling nature of cause—Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907, sec. 30.

18. The pursuer, in a Sheriff Court action of damages at common law for £100 for personal injury, required the case, under sec. 30 of the Sheriff Courts Act, 1907, to be remitted to the Court of Session for trial by jury. The Court refused the application and, under the powers conferred on them by that section, remitted the case back to the Sheriff, holding that it was unsuitable for jury trial in respect of the trifling nature of the injuries averred. Barclay v. Smith & Co., p. 473.

1. In a prosecution for keeping a house as a brothel the prosecutor examined as witnesses two policemen who repeated conversations overheard by them in the house in question. The accused objected to the evidence on the grounds that she was not present when the conversations took place, and that the persons whose conversations were overheard were not examined as witnesses. Held that the evidence was competent, in respect that it was not led to prove the truth of the matters stated in the conversations, but merely to prove the fact that such conversations took place. M'Laren v. Macleod, (J.) p. 61.

Admissibility of extrinsic evidence to negative revocation of prior testamentary writing.

2. Circumstances in which held that extrinsic evidence (consisting chiefly of correspondence between a testatrix and her law-agents) was not competent for the purpose of establishing that she intended, notwithstanding a clause of revocation in a will of later date, that a document of prior date should form part of her testamentary writings. Hannay's Trustees v. Keith, p. 482.

3. A Scotsman living in Scotland left, among other legacies to charities all of which were Scottish, a legacy to "The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children." In a competition between "The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children" (London) and "The Scottish National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children" (Edinburgh), held that the designation in the will was ambiguous, and proof allowed of extrinsic facts to show which of the Societies the testator meant. Nasmyth's Trustees v. National Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children, p. 412.

Proof of trust—"Deed of trust"—Deposit-receipt—Act 1696, cap. 25.

4. A deposit-receipt is not a "deed of trust" within the meaning of the Act 1696, cap. 25; and accordingly parole proof allowed in an action by a party for declarator that the sum contained in a deposit-receipt in the names of others truly belonged to him. Cairns v. Davidson, p. 1054.

Facts subsequent to raising of action—Damages for injuries caused by dog—Proof of dog's conduct subsequent to raising of action.

5. In an action of damages brought by a person bitten by a dog against its owner, observed (per the Lord Justice Clerk) that evidence of attacks made by the dog on other persons after the date of the raising of the action was admissible for the purpose of showing that the dog was of a vicious disposition. Gordon v. Mackenzie, p. 109.

Church—Seats—Assignment of sittings.

6. Opinion (per the Lord President), that an assignment of sittings in a family pew can only be established by writing. Paterson v. Brown, p. 292.

Witnesses—Credibility—Opinion of Judge who heard witnesses—Duty of Court of appeal.

7. Observations as to the duty of a Court of appeal to form an opinion for itself upon questions of fact submitted to review, and as to the weight to be attached to the opinion of the Judge who saw and heard the witnesses. Christie v. Lyburn, p. 1077.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906—Remit to arbitrator for further statement of fact—Power of arbitrator to hear further evidence.

8. In a case stated for appeal against the decision of the Sheriff-substitute acting as arbitrator in proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, in the course of which proceedings proof had been led, the Court remitted to the Sheriff-substitute to find whether the workman had given statutory notice of his accident as soon as practicable thereafter. The Sheriff-substitute reported that he had himself re-examined the doctor who had attended the workman during his illness, and made a finding in answer to the question put by the Court. This report was objected to on the ground that it proceeded on evidence which had been taken after the proof had been closed. Held that the Sheriff-substitute was entitled, under the remit, to take further proof, and objection repelled. Park v. Coltness Iron Co., Limited, p. 1163.

1. In the case of a grant of lands abutting on an inland loch, with parts and pertinents, there is a presumption that the grantee has a joint right of property in the loch, along with the other proprietor or proprietors whose lands abut upon it. This presumption will not be prejudiced by a subsequent express grant of the loch to another, unless that grant is followed for the prescriptive period by such exclusive possession as would be required by law for the establishment of a new and adverse right in the possessor; any lesser degree of possession, such as might be admissible for the purpose of explaining the limits of a grant or conveyance in a question with its author, being insufficient. Evidence which was held to be insufficient to establish exclusive possession of an inland loch. Meacher v. Blair-Oliphant, p. 417.

Title to heritage—Bounding title—Property described as lying within parish—Proof of parochial boundaries—Plans and Ordnance Survey maps.

2. In an action between two landed proprietors as to the ownership of a loch the pursuer contended that the defender was excluded from the loch by the fact that the latter's estate was described in his titles as lying within the parish of Blairgowrie, and that the loch lay outwith the parish boundaries. Evidence on which it was held that the pursuer had failed to prove that the loch lay outwith the parish boundaries. Observations (1) on the evidence required to prove parish boundaries, and (2) on the value of plans and Ordnance Survey maps as evidence. Meacher v. Blair-Oliphant, p. 417.

See Interdict—Reparation, 10, 11.

PUBLIC-HOUSE. Licensing authority—Disqualification of member—Bias.

1. Held that the mere fact of belonging to a temperance society pledged to the principal of "no licence in any form under any circumstances for the sale of liquors to be used as a beverage" did not operate as a disqualification for sitting as a member of a Licensing Court. M'Geehen v. Knox, p. 688.

Licensing authority—Discretion—District over-licensed—Mode of selecting certificates to be refused.

2. Opinion (per the Lord President) that where the Licensing Authorities of a district think that the district is over-licensed and that the number of licences should be reduced, they should obtain a report from a trustworthy source, and thereafter consider the questions raised by the report. Goodall v. Shaw, p. 630.

Certificate—Renewal—Objections—Title to object—Objection by mandate—Averment that objections in reality those of mandatory—Competency of general objection that district over-licensed.

3. A licence-holder, who had been refused a renewal of his certificate, brought an action for the reduction of the deliverance of the Licensing Court on the grounds (1) that the objections which had been taken to his certificate were not in reality the objections of the ostensible objectors, but those of a vigilance association (with no locus standi) to whose agent the objectors had been induced to give a mandate; (2) that no specific objection had been taken to his certificate, but merely a general objection that the district was over-licensed; (3) that the only objection to the pursuer's certificate being that general one, the magistrates, by the procedure which they had adopted at the Licensing Court, viz., first granting all the certificates which were not objected to by the agent, and only thereafter proceeding to consider those to which he had taken objection, had made it impossible for them to exercise a proper judicial discretion with regard to the renewal of the pursuer's certificate. Held that none of the grounds of reduction were relevant; but observed with regard to number (3) that, had the Licensing Court resolved beforehand to reduce the licences in the district by a certain number, the result would have been different. Goodall v. Shaw, p. 630.

See Justiciary Cases, 18, 19.

RAILWAY. Powers of Railway Company—Sale of whole permanent way material—Ultra vires.

1. Held that a railway company which had constructed its line under statutory powers, was not entitled to sell the rails, bridges, and other materials forming its whole permanent way, although it was financially impossible for it to continue to work the undertaking; and interdict granted at the instance of a holder of shares and debenture stock of the company against such a sale. Observed that different considerations would arise in the case of a company which proposed only to sell the materials of an unremunerative branch line which was no longer in use. Ellice v. Invergarry and Fort Augustus Railway Co., p. 849.

Dividend—Effect of Public Act on rights created by previous Private Act—Half-yearly or yearly calculation—North British Railway Act, 1888, sec. 47—Railway Companies (Accounts and Returns) Act, 1911, sec. 4 (1).

2. The North British Railway Company, in exercise of powers conferred by a private Act of 1888, created certain preferred and deferred ordinary stocks, the terms of the Act providing that a non-cumulative dividend of 3 per cent should be payable out of the available profits of each half year to the preferred stockholders, and that the balance of such profits should go to the deferred stockholders. By the Railway Companies (Accounts and Returns) Act, 1911, every railway company was relieved of any obligation to prepare or submit to their shareholders or auditors accounts or balance-sheets oftener than once a year. Held that the later Act did not relieve the railway company of the duty of calculating the dividends due to the preferred and deferred stockholders on the basis of the profits of each half year. North British Railway Co. v. Wingate, p. 1092.

Railway and Canal Commissioners—Arbitration—Ascertainment of quantum meruit under a contract—Competency—Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1873, sec. 8.

3. For the purpose of authorising them to construct a railway, the promoters of the Newburgh and North Fife Railway Company obtained an Act of Parliament, which incorporated the Companies Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, the Companies Clauses Act, 1863, and Acts amending the same. A Schedule to the Act contained an agreement between the Company and the North British Railway Company, whereby the North British Company guaranteed a fixed dividend upon "the paid-up share capital" of the Newburgh Company. The Newburgh Company, having failed to obtain sufficient subscriptions to its shares, entered into an agreement with a syndicate, whereby the Company undertook to issue to the syndicate its whole unissued capital, and the syndicate undertook to construct the railway. It was established by proof that the cost of construction was about 60 per cent of the face value of the capital issued to the syndicate, and that the syndicate disposed of the shares so issued at less than par. The Court having held that the capital so issued to the syndicate was not "paid-up share capital" of the Newburgh Company in the sense of the agreement with the North British Company, and that the North British Company was only bound to contribute to the dividend on so much of the capital of the Newburgh Company as was issued in consideration of cash or the equivalent of cash, further held that it was competent for the Railway and Canal Commissioners, sitting as arbiters, to determine what amount of the capital was issued in consideration of cash or the equivalent of cash. Newburgh and North Fife Railway Company v. North British Railway Company, p. 1166.

RATES AND ASSESSMENTS. Complaint by ratepayer to Local Authority—Liability to action for slander.

1. Observed that a ratepayer is entitled to lay facts reported to him which cast aspersions on an official before the proper authorities for investigation, and is under no duty to inquire into them before doing so; and, although the facts are disproved, he is not bound to apologise or to withdraw the statements made to the authorities, although a duty of future reticence may be imposed on him. Couper v. Lord Balfour of Burleigh, p. 492.

Exemption—Crown—Buildings held by statutory body and occupied for public purposes—Law Courts—Buildings partly let.

2. Held that a statutory body of commissioners created for the purpose of holding buildings in Glasgow, which were used for certain public purposes, viz., Justiciary Courts, Sheriff Courts, and Justice of the Peace Courts, were exempt from assessment both for owners' and occupiers' rates, except with regard to certain portions of the buildings which were let to the County Council and for which rents were paid; and that in respect of these portions, seeing that they were held as mere investments, the commissioners were liable for owners' rates. Glasgow Court Houses Commissioners v. Glasgow Parish Council, p. 194.

Poor and School rates—House Letting and Rating (Scotland) Act, 1911, sec. 7—Small dwelling-house—Responsibility of owner for occupiers' assessments—House entered in Valuation-roll as unoccupied—Deduction of percentage for cost of collection—Method of deduction.

3. Held (1) that, under the House Letting and Rating (Scotland) Act, 1911 (which makes the owner of a small dwelling-house responsible for all assessments liability to pay which is imposed on the occupier thereof), a parish council is entitled to recover the occupiers' portion of the poor and school rates for the whole financial year from such an owner, even though the house is entered in the Valuation-roll as unlet and unoccupied, subject to a right of repayment for any portion of the year during which the premises are in fact unoccupied. Held (2) that the owner of a small dwelling-house is entitled at the time of payment to deduct from the occupiers' assessment the statutory percentage allowed him for cost of collection, but that, if he subsequently claims repayment of any portion of that assessment, he must allow a counter-deduction of the same percentage on that portion. *Glasgow Parish Council v. REPARATION. Illegal apprehension—Arrest by constables without warrant of person "reasonably suspected of" crime—Privilege—Glasgow Police Act, 1866, sec. 88.

1. In an action of damages for wrongous arrest brought against two Glasgow constables who had apprehended the pursuer without a warrant, the defenders maintained that, as they had bona fide suspected the pursuer of a crime and as, in their judgment, their grounds of suspicion were reasonable, they were protected by sec. 88 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, which empowers constables to arrest without warrant persons "reasonably suspected of having committed" a penal offence. Held that it was a question for the jury whether the grounds of the defenders' suspicion were or were not reasonable, and that the pursuer was entitled to an issue. Shields v. Shearer, p. 1012.

Wrongous information to the police—Want of probable cause—Slander—Privilege—Malice—Statements in trade circular.

2. In an action of damages, at the instance of a discharged employee against his former employers, a jury found for the pursuer on issues whether the defenders had maliciously and without probable cause lodged with the criminal authorities charges of theft and of fraud against the pursuer, and whether they had caused to be circulated amongst certain business firms a circular in which they maliciously represented that the pursuer had been guilty of fraudulent practices. Circumstances in which the Court set aside the verdict on the ground that there was no evidence before the jury either of want of probable cause or of malice. Mills v. Kelvin & James White, Limited, p. 521.

Slander—Innuendo—Newspaper—Trade publication—List of decrees in absence—Erroneous entry—Imputation of Insolvency.

3. An issue of a trade journal known as Stubbs' Weekly Gazette contained a list headed "Extracts from the Court Books of Decrees in Absence in the Small-Debt Courts. Note.—It is probable that some of the decrees have been sisted, settled, or paid; and in no case does publication of the decree imply inability to pay on the part of anyone named, or anything more than the fact that the entry published appeared in the Court Books." In an action of damages for slander against the proprietors of the journal at the instance of a tradesman, whose name was erroneously included in the list in respect of a decree for £9, 19s. 6d., the facts being that the debt had been paid and the action dismissed, the Lord Ordinary approved of an issue in which the pursuer innuendoed the entry as falsely and calumniously representing that he was unable to pay his debts. Held that the entry, when read in conjunction with the explanatory note, would not bear the innuendo suggested, and that the issue fell to be disallowed. Russell v. Stubbs, Limited, (H. L.) p. 14.

Slander—Privilege—Sufficiency of averments of malice—Complaint by ratepayer to Local Authority—Refusal to withdraw statement.

4. The matron of a hospital belonging to certain local authorities brought an action of damages against a ratepayer within the hospital district for defamatory statements contained in two letters. The first of these letters was sent by him to the clerk of one of the local authorities, reporting certain information received by him as to the pursuer's conduct as a matron (which he stated, if true, pointed, in his opinion, to criminal conduct), and demanding an inquiry. The second letter was sent by him to the Local Government Board, and expressed dissatisfaction with the result of two inquiries in which the pursuer had been absolved of blame, and made another charge, based on fresh information, against the pursuer, and craved a further inquiry. A third inquiry was held in which the pursuer was again absolved. The defender, however, refused to apologise or withdraw the charges. The defender's letters were admittedly privileged, but the pursuer maintained that malice sufficiently appeared from (1) the violent terms in which the statements in the letters were couched; (2) the fact that they were made without prior inquiry; (3) the reiteration of them; and (4) the defender's adherence to them and refusal to apologise. Held that these facts and circumstances were not sufficient to infer malice; and action dismissed as irrelevant. Couper v. Lord Balfour of Burleigh, p. 492.

Slander—Privilege—Sufficiency of averments of malice—Master's liability for servant's slander.

5. In an action of damages for slander, brought against a limited company owning a music hall, the pursuer averred that, while he was present at a performance in the hall, he was falsely accused by an attendant of indecent conduct towards a member of the audience, and that he was taken to a private room where the slander was repeated by the attendant and by the manager. He averred that these slanderous statements "were made and persisted in most recklessly, pertinaciously, and maliciously." Held that the occasion was privileged, and that, as there was no sufficient averment of facts inferring malice, the action was irrelevant. Gorman v. Moss' Empires, Limited, p. 1.

Slander—Privilege—Liability of master for verbal slander uttered by servant on privileged occasion—Personal malice of servant.

6. In an action of damages brought against a railway company on account of a verbal slander uttered by the manager of one of their station bars, the pursuer, who had been employed as a barmaid at this bar, averred that, on the occasion of her dismissal from this post, the manager (who had the control of the servants employed at the bar) uttered the slander complained of—a charge of appropriating the company's funds—knowing it to be false and with the object of gratifying his private ill-will towards her. The occasion was admittedly privileged. Held that the action was irrelevant, in respect that the pursuer's averments disclosed that the malice alleged as actuating the slander was personal to the manager and in no way connected with the business of the defenders, and, accordingly, that the defenders could not be held responsible. Aiken v. Caledonian Railway Co., p. 66.

Slander—Issue—Verdict—Latitude of time—"On or about."

7. In an action of damages for slander the issue submitted to the jury was whether "on or about 12th March 1912" the defender at or near a shop occupied by the pursuer and in presence and hearing of one of the pursuer's neighbours had made a slanderous statement concerning the pursuer which imported that he was a thief. The jury having found that the slander had been uttered by the defender at the place and in the circumstances set forth in the issue, but that it had been so uttered in February 1912, the Lord President directed that the verdict should be entered for the defender. Smith v. Paton, p. 1203.

Negligence—Unfenced sandpit on private ground—Use of pit by children as playground—Hidden danger.

8. In an action by a father for solatium for the death of his daughter, aged seven, the pursuer averred that the defenders were the owners of ground abutting on a public path and separated therefrom by a hedge in which there were gaps ; that on the ground there was an unfenced sandpit 80 yards from the path ; that children were in the habit of entering the ground and using the pit as a playground ; that the defenders knew of this practice and " allowed " it ; that the pursuer's child was killed by a fall of sand while playing in the pit ; and that the defenders knew, before the accident happened, that the face of the sand was at a dangerous angle and liable to fall, but took no steps to have the danger removed or to exclude the children. Held that the pursuer's averments were relevant, and issue allowed. Mackenzie v. Fairfield Ship-building and Engineering Co., Limited, p. 213.

Negligence—Unfenced rubbish heap in field frequented by public—Injury to child—Liability of person using, but not owning, the field.

9. A father brought an action of damages against a burgh authority for the death of his daughter, under three years of age, who had received fatal injuries through her clothes becoming ignited at a fire burning upon a rubbish heap or " coup " where the burgh rubbish was deposited. Circumstances in which held that the pursuer's averments were irrelevant to found an issue against the defenders, in respect (1) that it appeared therefrom that the defenders were not the owners of the field or coup, and had therefore neither the right nor the duty to fence them ; and (2) that the material which they put upon the ground was not dangerous in itself but only became so when ignited, and there was no averment that the defenders, or those for whom they were responsible, had kindled the fire in question. Johnstone v. Magistrates of Lochgelly, p. 1078.

Negligence—Lease—Property—Common Stair—Title to sue—Wife of tenant of house on common stair injured owing to defect in stair.

10. The wife of the tenant of a dwelling-house on a common stair brought an action of damages against the landlord for injuries sustained by her owing to the defective condition of the stair. The defender contended that the pursuer had no title to sue, in respect that she was not a party to the lease. Held, (by the Lord Ordinary, Hunter), that the pursuer had a good title to sue, in respect that the stair was not included in the lease, but remained under the control of the landlord, who was bound to keep it reasonably safe for tenants and other persons using it as a means of access to the houses. Mellon v. Henderson, p. 1207.

Negligence—Property—Common Stair—Duty to repair—Possession and control—Individual houses of tenement sublet by lessee of whole tenement—Question of liability between lessee and proprietor.

11. A tenement of eight houses was let by the proprietor to a company, and the individual houses sublet by the latter to their employees. A pupil child visiting one of the houses, which was approached by an outside stair common to that and to another house, fell from the stair, in consequence of a concealed defect in the railing and was injured. Circumstances in which, in an action of damages at the instance of the father against the proprietor and the company, the latter were held to be alone liable, on the ground that they had possession and control of the stair and railing, and that, in consequence of their contract with their tenant, the child was on the stair on their invitation. Kennedy v. Shotts Iron Company, Limited, and Others, p. 1143.

Negligence—Flooding of land in burgh—Responsibility of magistrates—Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879, sec. 179—Edinburgh Corporation Act, 1900, sec. 28.

12. The tenant of a market garden on the estate of Craigentenny within the burgh of Edinburgh brought an action against the magistrates of Edinburgh for damages caused to his garden by the overflowing of the Craigentenny burn. Circumstances in which the House of Lords held the defenders liable having in view especially the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879, sec. 179, and the Edinburgh Corporation Act, 1900, sec. 28. Hanley v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, (H. L.) p. 27.

Negligence—Contributory negligence—Accident—Proximate cause—Tramway.

13. *In an action of damages against a tramway company the pursuer's case was that, when crossing a street, she stopped in the four-foot way between two sets of car rails to allow a car to pass, and that her dress was caught by a stay that projected beneath the car and she was thrown down and run over. She maintained that had the car been provided with side guards, as it should have been, the accident would not have happened. The defenders pleaded contributory negligence, their case being that the pursuer, not looking where she was going, had herself walked into the car. Held that, if the pursuer's own negligence was a causa proxima of the accident, the fact that there might also have been contemporaneous negligence on the part of the defenders which affected the accident did not render them liable. Gibb v. Edinburgh and District Tramways Co., Limited, p. 541.*

Negligence—Contributory negligence—Accident—Proximate cause—Tramway.

14. A passenger who had alighted from a northward bound car, and who had passed immediately behind it with the object of crossing to the farther side of the street, was knocked down and injured by a southward bound car at the moment when she reached the nearest rail of the line on which it was travelling. In an action for damages against the Tramway Company she admitted in evidence that she had not looked to see if any traffic was approaching from the north, but contended that the defenders were liable in respect that the driver of the southward bound car had neither sounded his bell nor slowed down in passing the stationary car, as he was bound to do. Held that the defenders were not liable, seeing that, even on the assumption that the driver was to blame as alleged, the pursuer's evidence showed that the accident was due to her own negligence in failing to take the ordinary precaution of looking for approaching traffic, it being clear that the southward bound car must have been so close to the pursuer when she stepped into the danger zone that neither sounding the bell nor slowing down could have prevented the accident. Macleod v. Edinburgh and District Tramways Co., Limited, p. 624.

Negligence—Contributory negligence—Patting unknown dog.

15. In an action of damages brought against the owner of a dog for personal injuries caused by its biting the pursuer, the defender maintained that the pursuer had been guilty of contributory negligence in that he, although the dog was unknown to him, had patted it. Held that this did not amount to contributory negligence, and damages awarded. Gordon v. Mackenzie, p. 109.

16. The widow and children of a deceased miner brought an action against a medical man in which they averred that the defender had made an unauthorised post-mortem examination of the deceased, and in respect thereof claimed a sum of damages. Held that the pursuers had set forth a relevant ground of action, and that the appropriate form of trial was trial by jury. Hughes v. Robertson, p. 394.

Damages for personal injury—Title to sue—Executor.

17. Held that the executor of a party who had, prior to his death, intimated a claim for damages for personal injury, had a title to sue for such damages. Observations on the maxim actio personalis moritur cum persona, and on the use of the phrase actio injuriarum as a nomen juris in Scots law. Leigh's Executrix v. Caledonian Railway Co., p. 838.

Damages—Excess of damages—Damages for personal injury.

18. Circumstances in which the Court refused to set aside, on the ground of excess of damages, the verdict of a jury awarding £4000 to a farmer (the profit of whose farm amounted to about £350 a year) in respect of personal injuries sustained by him in a railway accident. Thoms v. Caledonian Railway Co., p. 804.

REPETITION. Sale—Extent of subjects sold—Error in fact innocently induced by seller—Repetition of price—Interest.

In 1902, by a minute of sale, a firm of quarrymasters, who had a lease of a quarry, sold the goodwill of their business, their interest in the lease, and the buildings on the ground "in so far as belonging to" the sellers "or for which they are entitled to receive value or allowances at the termination of their occupancy." The sellers believed that certain buildings on the ground belonged to them or that they were entitled to receive allowances therefor at the termination of the lease, and they represented this to the purchasers. The purchasers accepted the representation without inquiry, the price of the buildings was adjusted by a valuator and paid accordingly, and the purchasers entered into, and continued in, possession of the whole subjects. At the termination of the purchasers' occupancy in 1908, it was ascertained that some of the buildings included in the valuation belonged to the landlord, and that nothing was payable to the tenants in respect thereof. In an action at the instance of the purchasers against the sellers for repetition of the price paid for these buildings, held that the pursuers were entitled to repetition (with interest at 3 per cent from the date of payment), in respect that the money had been paid by the pursuers under an error in fact induced by the defenders. Duncan, Galloway, & Co., Limited, v. Duncan, Falconer, & Co., p. 265.

RES JUDICATA. Finding in arbitration under Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906—Finality—Bar to subsequent action of damages at common law.

In an application under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, to end or diminish compensation payable to a minor workman, the arbitrator found that the workman had agreed to accept compensation at a certain rate, and reduced the amount. The workman having thereafter brought an action against his employers for damages for his injury at common law and for reduction, on the ground of minority and lesion, of the arbitrator's finding that he had agreed to accept compensation, the defenders, on the ground that the arbitrator was final on questions of fact, pleaded that the matter was res judicata in respect of his decision. The Court repelled the plea. M'Feetridge v. Stewarts & Lloyds, Limited, p. 773.

RETENTION. Factor's right to retain estate documents in security of debt due by estate—Law-agent.

Held that the factor on a landed estate had, as against a bondholder desirous of appearing as a party to proceedings in the Land Court, no right to retain the leases or documents in security of a debt due to him by the estate. Observed by the Lord President that the only person who has such a right of retention available against everyone is a law-agent. Macrae v. Leith, p. 901.

REVENUE. Estate-duty—Deductions allowable as incumbrances—“Incumbrances created by a disposition made by the deceased”—“Disposition taking effect out of the interest of the deceased”—Provisions for widow and children—Relief—Finance Act, 1894, secs. 7 (1) (a), and 22 (2) (b).

1. A executed a trust-disposition and settlement by which he directed his trustees to pay an annuity out of his estate to B, and also, should B request them to do so, to burden the estate with provisions for B's wife and family. On the death of B the fee of the estate was directed to be conveyed to C. After A's death his trustees paid the annuity to B during his life, and also, at B's request, burdened the estate with bonds of provision for his widow and children. On B's death the estate was conveyed to C, who, in adjusting estate-duty with the Inland Revenue, sought to make deductions in respect of the provisions to B's widow and children. The Inland Revenue refused to allow the deductions, and C paid duty on the whole estate. A question having arisen as to C's right to recover from the widow and children the estate-duty paid in respect of their provisions, held that, as these incumbrances were not “created by a disposition made by” B in the sense of sec. 7 (1) (a) of the Finance Act, 1894, and did not take effect “out of the interest of” B in the sense of sec. 22 (2) (b), they were deductible; and, accordingly, that C could not recover from the beneficiaries this estate-duty which he ought not to have paid. Colquhoun's Trustees v. Abercromby, p. 874.

Income-tax—Profits—Deduction of expense incurred in earning profits—Property and Income-Tax Act, 1842, sec. 100, Schedule D—Income-Tax Act, 1853, sec. 2, Schedule D.

2. A lady made a profit by letting her furnished house for two months, and, when assessed for income-tax thereon, claimed to deduct the rent of another house which she had taken to reside in during that period. Held that this rent was not an expense necessarily incurred in earning the profit, and accordingly that the deduction should be disallowed. Wylie v. Inland Revenue, p. 16.

Income-tax—Profits of trade—Deductions—Hire of wagons with option of purchase—Deduction of part of payments representing hire.

3. Under a hire-purchase agreement, between a coal company and a wagon company, the latter agreed to let on hire to the former a number of wagons for a fixed period of years in return for an annual payment, an option being conferred on the coal company to purchase the wagons at the end of the period at a nominal price. Held that the portion of the annual payments which represented the hire of wagons, but not the portion which represented the price of the option to purchase, fell to be allowed as a deduction in arriving at the assessable profits of the coal company for the purpose of income-tax. Darngavil Coal Co., Limited, v. Inland Revenue, p. 602.

Income-tax—Profits of trade—Deductions—Money wholly expended for purpose of trade—Income-Tax Act, 1842, sec. 100, Schedule (D), First Case, First Rule applying to First and Second Cases.

4. The funds of the Fife and Clackmannan Coalowners' Association were derived from voluntary subscriptions or "levies," collected by the association from its individual members, and were expended, inter alia, on the following objects, viz.:—(1) Expenses of the Conciliation Board, (2) Subscriptions to the Mining Association of Great Britain, and (3) Experiments on the explosive properties of coal dust made at the request of the Government. Held that an individual member of the Association in stating the profits of his business for the purpose of income-tax, was entitled to deduct that proportion of the levy paid by him to the association which effeired to the first of the above objects, but not the proportions thereof effeiring to the second or third, in respect that a payment towards the first of these objects was, whereas a payment to either of the latter was not, one which, had it been made by the individual member directly, could have properly been deducted by him as money wholly expended for the purpose of his trade. Lochgelly Iron and Coal Co., Limited, v. Inland Revenue, p. 810.

Inhabited House Duty—Separate tenements—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878, sec. 13 (1).

5. A large building, once occupied as a hotel, was let to a number of tenants, each tenant occupying premises consisting of one or more rooms. These premises all entered from a central staircase or from passages leading therefrom. All the premises were occupied for business purposes with the exception of two—a caretaker's house on the top flat and an eight-roomed dwelling-house which entered from a passage on the second floor leading from the central staircase. Held that the premises were "divided into, and let in, different tenements" in the sense of sec. 13 (1) of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878, and that each separate tenement had to be considered by itself for the purpose of inhabited house duty. Cotton's Trustees v. Farmer, p. 1126.

Duties on Land Values—Valuation—"Assessable site value"—Minus value—Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, sec. 25 (4).

6. Held that under sec. 25 (4) of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, the "assessable site value" of land may be a minus quantity. Herbert's Trustees v. Inland Revenue, (H. L.) p. 34.

Duties on Land Values—Increment Value Duty—Site Value on occasion of sale—Method of ascertainment—Deductions—Meaning of "like" deductions—Deduction in respect of goodwill and matters personal to parties—Finance (1909-1910) Act, 1910, secs. 2, 25.

7. A valuation of a tenement under the Finance (1909-1910) Act for the purposes of duties on land values, fixed the following values as at 30th April 1909:—(1) Original total value, £400, (2) original assessable site value (got by deducting £380 for buildings), £20. In June 1911 the tenement was sold by the owner for £650 to a purchaser, who had for many years occupied the tenement as a tenant, and had carried on a draper's business there as well as used it as his dwelling-house. Nothing had occurred between 1909 and 1911 to add to the value either of the site or buildings. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue, for the purposes of increment value duty, fixed the site value on the occasion of the sale at £270, by deducting from the purchase price of £650 the sum formerly deducted as the value of the buildings, viz., £380. An appeal was taken to a referee, who fixed the site value at £70, a figure which he arrived at in the following way :—Being of opinion that the property had not altered in value since the original valuation, but that the figures in that valuation were too low, he fixed the value of the buildings at £400, and deducted from the purchase price of £650 (1) under sec. 25 (4) (a) the value of the buildings, viz., £400, and (2) under sec. 25 (4) (d) a sum of £180, being the portion of the price paid which was, in his opinion, attributable to goodwill or personal considerations. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue contended (1) that under sec. 25 (4) (a) the deduction for buildings should have been £380, the same amount as had been deducted in the original valuation, in respect that the expression “like deductions” in sec. 2 (2) (a) was equivalent to “same deductions”; (2) that, in the circumstances, no deduction for goodwill or personal considerations under sec. 25 (4) (d) fell to be allowed. Held (1) that the referee had rightly revalued the deduction to be made in respect of buildings, the expression “like” not being equivalent to “same”; (2) (dis. Lord Cullen) that the referee was entitled to attribute £180 to goodwill or personal considerations, and to deduct that sum; and, accordingly, that the site value on the occasion of the transfer was £70. Opinions that where property consisting of lands and buildings increases or decreases in value the increase or decrease does not necessarily fall to be attributed to the site, but may be attributed in whole or in part to the buildings. Inland Revenue v. Walker, p. 719.

Stamp-duty—“Deed”—Stamp Act, 1891, First Schedule.

8. The First Schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891, includes, among stamp-duties payable on instruments, a duty of 10s. on “Deed of any kind whatsoever not described in this Schedule.” Held that a minute of acceptance of office by trustees, engrossed upon a trust-disposition and settlement and signed by the trustees before two subscribing witnesses, was not a “deed” within the meaning of the Schedule, and was not chargeable with a stamp-duty of 10s., or with any stamp-duty. Henderson’s Trustees v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, p. 987.

See Justiciary Cases, 20.

RIGHT IN SECURITY. Heritable security—Bondholder in possession under decree of maills and duties—Right to delivery of leases and other estate documents—Factor’s right to retain estate documents in security of debt due by estate—Law-agent.

1. Held that a bondholder in possession of a landed estate under a decree of maills and duties was entitled to obtain delivery of the leases and other estate documents showing the contractual relations between the landlord and his tenants, for the purpose of enabling the bondholder to appear as a party to proceedings in the Land Court; and that the factor on the estate had no right to retain the leases or documents in security of a debt due to him by the estate. Observed by the Lord President that the only person who has such a right of retention available against every-one is a law-agent. Macrae v. Leith, p. 901.

Bond and disposition in security—“Default in payment”—Notice requisite to constitute default and justify action of maills and duties—Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868, sec. 119, Sched. FF (1) (2).

2. The creditor under a bond and disposition in security in the statutory form given in Schedule FF (1) of the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868, served upon the debtor a schedule of intimation, requisition, and protest in the form given in Schedule FF (2) of the Act, which stated that “payment is now required” of the principal sum due under the bond with interest to date, and that if after the expiry of three months the sums “of which payment is now required” should not be paid, then the creditor “may proceed to sell” the lands disposed in security. Ten days later he brought an action of maills and duties to obtain possession of the lands and to uplift the rents. The debtor was not in arrear with interest. Held that the schedule of intimation was a demand for immediate payment; that the debtor not having paid instantly was in “default in payment” within the meaning of sec. 119 of the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868; and that accordingly the action was competent. M’Ara v. Anderson, p. 931.

Bond fraudulently discharged handed to innocent purchaser of property—Right of purchaser to retain bond.

3. The purchaser of a certain property, burdened with a bond, paid the full price of the property, and received along with the disposition the bond and a forged discharge thereof from the seller’s agent, who was also agent for the bondholders and had custody of the bond. On the agent’s death it was found that he had embezzled the sum in the bond. In an action by the bondholders against the purchaser of the property for delivery of the bond, held that the pursuers were entitled to delivery of the bond in respect (1) that the bond was not one of the property titles carried to the defender by the assignation of writs, (2) that the pursuers, having given their agent no authority to discharge the bond, were not liable for his fraudulent discharge thereof. Bowie’s Trustees v. Watson, p. 326.

ROAD. Extraordinary expenses—Recovery by road authority—Requisites of surveyor’s certificate—Road of less than statutory width—Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878, sec. 57.

In an action to recover the expense of repairing damage done to a road by extraordinary traffic from the person responsible for the traffic, held that it was not essential that the surveyor’s certificate required under sec. 57 of the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878, should bear to have been framed, or should in fact have been framed, with regard to the average expense of repairing highways in the neighbourhood; but observed that it was the duty of the road authority, before bringing the action, to have regard to such average expense. Opinion (per Lord Salvesen) that a road authority is not barred from recovering damage done to a road by extraordinary traffic merely because the road is of less than the width prescribed by statute. Highland District Committee of Perth County Council v. Rattray, p. 794.

lease of a quarry, sold the goodwill of their business, their interest in the lease, and the buildings on the ground "in so far as belonging to" the sellers "or for which they are entitled to receive value or allowances at the termination of their occupancy." The sellers believed that certain buildings on the ground belonged to them or that they were entitled to receive allowances therefor at the termination of the lease, and they represented this to the purchasers. The purchasers accepted the representation without inquiry. At the termination of the purchasers' occupancy in 1908, it was ascertained that some of the buildings belonged to the landlord, and that nothing was payable to the tenants in respect thereof. Held that the purchasers were entitled to repetition from the sellers of the price paid for the buildings in respect that the money had been paid under an error in fact induced by the latter. Duncan, Galloway, & Co., Limited, v. Duncan, Falconer, & Co., p. 265.

Disconformity to contract—Rejection—Transference of property—Sale of Goods Act, 1893, secs. 11 (2), 17, and 18, Rule 5 (1)—Contract for building yacht—Passing of property on payment of first instalment—Right to reject completed yacht as disconform to contract.

2. A firm of shipbuilders contracted to build a yacht to the satisfaction of the designer (who was to superintend the work), the builders undertaking to put right within the time stipulated for the vessel's completion anything considered by him to be unsatisfactory. A clause in the contract provided that "the right of property in the yacht will pass from the contractors to the owner on payment of the first instalment of the price." The first instalment was paid; but repeatedly, during the progress of construction, complaints were made of defects in the workmanship. These the builders undertook to put right, but they failed to do so; and, when the yacht was completed, it was, on account of these defects, disconform to contract. The purchaser thereupon rejected the yacht and brought an action against the builders for repayment of the instalment paid and for damages. The builders maintained that as, by the terms of the contract and the provisions of the Sale of Goods Act, the property had passed on payment of the first instalment the purchaser was barred from rejecting the yacht. Held, in the circumstances, that the purchaser had never accepted the yacht or any part of it as conform to contract, and, accordingly, was not barred from rejecting it. Observed that the provisions of the Sale of Goods Act with regard to the passing of property in goods sold did not destroy in any way the existing rights under Scots law of rejection for disconformity to contract, which was preserved unimpaired by sec. 11 (2). Observed further that property might pass consistently with the existence of a right of rejection before final acceptance. Nelson v. William Chalmers & Co., Limited, p. 441.

3. The purchaser of a certain property, burdened with a bond, paid the full price of the property, and received along with the disposition the bond and a forged discharge thereof from the seller's agent, who was also agent for the bondholders and had custody of the bond. On the agent's death it was found that he had embezzled the sum in the bond. In an action by the bondholders against the purchaser of the property for delivery of the bond, held that the pursuers were entitled to delivery of the bond in respect (1) that the bond was not one of the property titles carried to the defender by the assignation of writs, (2) that the pursuers, having given their agent no authority to discharge the bond, were not liable for his fraudulent discharge thereof. Bowie's Trustees v. Watson, p. 326.

SCHOOL. Powers of School Board—“ Medical examination and supervision ” of pupils—Provision of medical or dental treatment—Education (Scotland) Act, 1908, secs. 4 and 6.

Held that the power conferred on school boards by sec. 4 of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1908, to provide, out of the school fund under their administration, for the medical “ examination and supervision ” of pupils attending school, did not authorise them to provide medical or dental “ treatment.” Glasgow School Board v. Allan, p. 370.

SHERIFF. Jurisdiction—Sending postcards inviting to bet—Jurisdiction of Sheriff in Sheriffdom where cards received—Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908, sec. 10 (4).

1. Held that the Sheriff-substitute at Dundee had jurisdiction to try a Glasgow bookmaker charged with a contravention of the Betting Acts by sending by post to persons in Dundee cards inviting them to bet. Lipsey v. Mackintosh, (J.) p. 104.

Jurisdiction—Reconvention—Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907, sec. 6 (h)—Foreigner suing as executor.

2. Held that the institution of an action in a Sheriff Court by a foreigner suing as an executor did not, under sec. 6 (h) of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907, give that Court jurisdiction in a counter action against him as an individual. Ponton's Executors v. Ponton, p. 598.

Process—“ Cause ”—Petition—Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907, First Schedule, Rule 50.

3. In a petition in the Sheriff Court, under sec. 10 of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, for completion of title to lands belonging to a deceased person by his heir-at-law, objections were lodged by the executor and general disponee of the deceased under a will executed by him. The petitioner in answer sought to set aside the will, averring that it had been impetrated by the objector from the deceased by fraud and circumvention. Held that the petition and answers constituted a “ cause ” within the meaning of Rule 50 of the First Schedule to the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907. Donald v. Donald, p. 274.

Process—Proof—Summary cause—Sheriff Courts Act, 1907, First Schedule—Rules of procedure regulating proof in ordinary Court—Application of rules to summary causes.

4. Opinion, per the Lord President, that the rules with regard to proof appended to the Sheriff Courts Act, 1907, are rules for regulating procedure in the ordinary Court and have no application to summary causes. Park v. Coltness Iron Co., Limited, p. 1163.

Process—Challenge of validity of will ope exceptionis—Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907, First Schedule, Rule 50.

5. In a petition in the Sheriff Court, under sec. 10 of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, for completion of title to lands belonging to a deceased person by his heir-at-law, objections were lodged by the executor and general disponee of the deceased under a will executed by him. that it had been impetrated by the objector from the deceased by fraud and circumvention. Held that, notwithstanding the terms of Rule 50 of the First Schedule of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907, the will could not, even so far as constituting a bar to the granting of the petition, be competently set aside by way of exception in that process; and process sisted to allow the petitioner to bring an action of reduction. Donald v. Donald, p. 274.

Expenses—Sheriff Court expenses awarded on appeal in Court of Session—Scale of taxation—Time for determination of scale—C. A. S., 1913, M. ii.

6. The C. A. S., 1913, M. ii., provides that, in actions for damages in the Sheriff Court, expenses shall be taxed on a higher or a lower scale according to whether or not the sum decreed for exceeds £50, unless the Sheriff shall direct otherwise. In an action of damages in the Sheriff Court the pursuer was awarded £100, but on appeal to the Court of Session that sum was reduced to £50 with expenses. The Auditor of the Court of Session having taxed the Sheriff Court expenses on the lower scale, held that he was right, and observed that, if the pursuer desired taxation on the higher scale, he should have moved for an instruction to the Auditor to that effect at the time when he obtained his award of expenses. Mickel v. M'Coard, p. 1036.

Expenses—Counsel—Interlocutor of Sheriff incidentally allowing fees recalled on appeal to Court of Session and expenses awarded—Right of Auditor to allow fees.

7. The allowance of fees to counsel made by the Sheriff in the interlocutor in which he answered the questions of law in a stated case held to warrant the Auditor in allowing counsel's fees in the Sheriff Court to the party found entitled to expenses on appeal to the Court of Session although the Court of Session had recalled the Sheriff's interlocutor. Taylor v. Steel-Maitland, p. 978.

Small-debt procedure—Appeal—Malice and oppression—Deviations from statutory form—Incompetency—Hearing of incompetent evidence—Small Debt (Scotland) Act, 1837, sec. 31.

8. Held that under sec. 31 of the Small Debt (Scotland) Act, 1837, no appeal was competent unless in a case where there had been a denial of justice owing to a failure of duty on the part of the Sheriff. Held further (1) that "malice and oppression" meant malice and oppression in the ordinary signification of the terms, and pointed to something done by the Sheriff from wrong or capricious motives of his own; (2) that the expression "deviations in point of form from the statutory enactments" covered any case in which the Sheriff had denied justice by not allowing the parties a hearing; (3) that "incompetency" referred exclusively to the entertainment by the Sheriff of a cause which he might not competently entertain. Circumstances in which the Court held that an appellant had failed to establish "incompetency" or "malice and oppression." Robson v. Menzies, (J.) p. 90.

SHIP. Maritime lien—Form of process for making effective maritime lien.

1. Where one vessel owing to her faulty navigation has damaged another vessel, the maritime lien over the former available to the owner of the latter cannot be made effective by arrestment of the vessel on the dependence of an action against her owner concluding for a sum of damages and separatim for declarator of lien and for warrant to sell. an arrestment so used. Opinion (per the Lord President) that the maritime lien could be made effective by arrestment of the vessel upon special application, e.g., in the Bill Chamber, after citation of all parties interested. Clan Line Steamers, Limited, v. Earl of Douglas Steamship Co., Limited, p. 967.

Bill of Lading—Exemptions—Seaworthiness—Exemption in bill of lading from liability for latent defect—Effect of incorporation in bill of lading of Australian Sea Carriage of Goods Act, 1904.

2. A bill of lading contained a stipulation that "any latent defects in the hull and tackle shall not be considered unseaworthiness, provided the same did not result from want of due diligence of the owner . . . or manager." By a "clause paramount" it was provided that the bill of lading was "to be read and construed as if every clause therein contained which is rendered illegal or null or void by the [Australian] Sea Carriage of Goods Act, 1904, had never been inserted therein." By that Act it is provided that in every bill of lading a warranty of seaworthiness shall be implied, and that any clause in a bill of lading, whereby any obligation to exercise due diligence, and to properly equip the ship, to make her seaworthy, and to make the ship's hold fit for cargo, is lessened or avoided, shall be null and void. Held that the incorporation of that Act in the bill of lading did not render the stipulation as to latent defects null and void; and that it was open to the ship-owners, sued for damages to the cargo arising from unseaworthiness due to defects in the ship, to establish as a defence that the defects were latent and did not result from want of due diligence on their part. Charlton & Bagshaw v. Law & Co., p. 317.

Bill of Lading—Exemptions—Condition exempting ship from responsibility for marking on goods—Liability for unmarked goods—Apportionment among consignees of unmarked goods not identifiable as part of any particular consignment—Commisio.

3. *Bales of jute, consigned to various consignees and specifically marked, were shipped under bills of lading bearing that the bales were received "marked and numbered as per margin," that the number of packages signed for was to be binding on the shipowners unless error or fraud were proved, but that "the weight, measure, quality, contents, and value" were unknown, and that the ship was not to be liable for "inaccuracies, obliteration or absence of marks." On the discharge of the ship 14 bales were amissing, and 11 bales were found to be, through some unknown cause, without marks and could not be identified as belonging to any particular consignment. It was not disputed that these 11 bales formed part of the jute shipped at the port of loading; but the consignees—four in number—who did not receive their full consignments refused to accept any of these bales. In an action for freight brought by the shipowners against one of the four consignees, who had received 6 bales less than his full consignment, the pursuers, while expressing their willingness to account to the four consignees for the value of the 14 missing bales in proportion to their respective shortages, maintained that the 11 bales ought to be allocated among them in like proportion. Held (rev. judgment of the Second Division, reported p. 19) that the terms of the bills of lading did not exoner the pursuers from their obligation to deliver the identical goods consigned for shipment, and that, as they had failed to show that any of the 11 bales were part of the defender's consignment, the defender was not bound to accept any proportion of the 11 bales, and that the pursuers were liable to the defender for the full value of the 6 bales. Tyzack & Branfoot Steamship Co., Limited, v. Sandeman & Sons, (H. L.) p. 84.*

Demurrage—Exceptions—Strikes—Failure of charterers to take reasonable measures to ensure timeous delivery of cargo.

4. A charter-party for the carriage of a cargo of coal, which stipulated for the completion of the loading within a certain period, contained a clause exempting the charterers from liability for time lost through "strikes," or any unavoidable accidents beyond their control, "preventing or delaying the working, loading, or shipping of the said cargo." In an action for demurrage against the charterers they pleaded that the delay had been caused by a strike. It was proved (1) that a strike of coal-trimmers had caused the colliery company, with whom the charterers had contracted for delivery of the coals, to restrict their output, and they did not deliver the coals in time for the loading which, but for the strike, they would probably have done; but (2) that the contract between the charterers and the colliery company contained no clause binding the company to deliver the coals in time for the loading; and (3) that it would not have been impossible for them to deliver the coals in time had they been bound to do so. Held that the defenders were liable in demurrage, in respect that—even if the strike were the direct cause of the delay, which was not proved—the failure of the charterers to contract for the timeous delivery of the coal excluded them from the benefit of the exception in the charter-party. Dampskibsselskabet Danmark v. Poulsen & Co., p. 1043.

Repeal—Effect of Public Act on rights created by previous Private Act—North British Railway Act, 1888, sec. 47—Railway Companies (Accounts and Returns) Act, 1911, sec. 4 (1).

3. The North British Railway Company, in exercise of powers conferred by a private Act of 1888, created certain preferred and deferred ordinary stocks, the terms of the Act providing that a non-cumulative dividend of 3 per cent should be payable out of the available profits of each half year to the preferred stockholders, and that the balance of such profits should go to the deferred stockholders. By the Railway Companies (Accounts and Returns) Act, 1911, every railway company was relieved of any obligation to prepare or submit to their shareholders or auditors accounts or balance-sheets oftener than once a year. Held that the later Act did not relieve the railway company of the duty of calculating the dividends due to the preferred and deferred stockholders on the basis of the profits of each half year. North British Railway Co. v. Wingate, p. 1092.

A assigned this bond to the extent of £2500 to a bank; the assignation being ex facie absolute, but in reality (though there was no back-letter) in security of advances by the bank. On A's death his trustees paid up these advances, amounting to £1000, and obtained a re-assignation of the bond. In an action to enforce her jus relictæ A's widow maintained that the bond was moveable; or, if this were not so, that quoad the £2500 A had, after the assignation, merely a claim for an accounting against the bank for the balance of that sum, and that this balance was therefore moveable. Held that the widow was not entitled to jus relictæ to any extent out of the sum secured by the bond, in respect (1) that the bond was heritable quoad her claim; and (2) that the assignation to the bank did not alter the character of A's interest in the sum secured by the bond or any portion of it. Heath v. Grant's Trustees, p. 78.

Testament—Precatory Trust.

3. A testator bequeathed his moveable estate to his widow, and stated in his will his "desire" that at her death some part of the estate should go to his brothers' and sisters' families—"In particular, I should like not less than £50 sterling left to" his brother's widow, "and I desire that my wife may make a settlement providing for this." The testator's widow having died intestate, held that her executor was not bound to give effect to the testator's request. Garden's Executor v. More, p. 285.

Testament—Revocation by later testamentary deed—Competency of extrinsic evidence—Re-execution of prior will—Effect on validity of intervening codicil.

4. A testatrix by her will, dated 13th January 1904, inter alia directed her trustees to pay the income of £5000 to her daughter, and on her daughter's death to pay £500 thereof to a granddaughter, "to pay a further sum of £1500 thereof in the manner to be afterwards directed by me in any writing or writings to be hereafter executed by me," and to pay the remainder, £3000, to certain grandchildren. The will contained a clause revoking "all previous testamentary writings." The testatrix left no writing dated after 13th January 1904 dealing with the sum of £1500, but there was found in her repositories after her death a holograph document dated 21st December 1903, by which she bequeathed the £1500 to certain beneficiaries. The will of 13th January 1904 was in its main provisions the same as a previous will executed by her on 16th December 1903, but contained certain alterations, one of them being the provision with regard to the sum of £1500 which was not contained in the previous will. Circumstances in which held (1) that the will of 13th January was not a mere re-execution of the will of 16th December, (2) that extrinsic evidence (consisting chiefly of correspondence between the testatrix and her law-agents) was not competent for the purpose of establishing that she intended, notwithstanding the clause of revocation in the will of later date, that the document of 21st December should form part of her testamentary writings, and accordingly (3) that the document of 21st December, having been revoked by the will of 13th January, was inoperative as a testamentary writing. Hannay's Trustees v. Keith, p. 482.

Mutual settlement—Revocation.

5. A husband and wife executed a mutual settlement in which each bequeathed to the other, on survival, the whole of his or her estate for that other's liferent use, and subject to certain burdens and directions which were identical in each case. In addition, the wife conveyed a heritable property to the husband in liferent and to certain of her own blood relations in fee. The settlement contained a clause reserving power of revocation by mutual consent during the joint lifetimes of the spouses, and declaring its finality unless so revoked, but reserving to the survivor a power of disposal over "all his or her own means and estate to be made and acquired after the decease of the first of us." Held that the provisions of the mutual settlement with regard to the wife's heritable property were contractual, and that she was not, after the death of her husband, entitled to revoke the destination thereof. Lawrie's Executor v. Haig and Others, p. 1159.

Testament—Construction—Admissibility of extrinsic evidence—Ambiguity in designation of beneficiary.

6. A Scotsman living in Scotland left, among other legacies to charities all of which were Scottish, a legacy to "The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children." In a competition between "The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children" (London) and "The Scottish National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children" (Edinburgh), held that the designation in the will was ambiguous, and proof allowed of extrinsic facts to show which of the Societies the testator meant. Nasmyth's Trustees v. National Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children, p. 412.

Testament—Construction—Words importing gift of heritage—Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868, sec. 20.

7. A testatrix, by her holograph testamentary disposition, on the narrative that she had "resolved to provide for the settlement of my affairs," appointed a "trustee and executor"; and after making bequests which were all of moveable property, declared "that if there be any residue after all expenses and legacies are paid, I bequeath the said residue to" three nieces, reserving her "life use of the whole estate and effects hereby conveyed." Held that the testatrix's heritable property was not carried by this deed, but passed to her heir-at-law. Bryden v. Cormack, p. 209.

Testament—Construction—Provision to daughter of "liferent use and enjoyment" of house—Incidence of burdens—Insurance premiums—Interest on bonds.

8. A testator directed his trustees "to retain for the liferent use and enjoyment of my unmarried daughter or daughters" two residences, and to pay out of the income of the estate an allowance "at the rate of £400 per annum towards the upkeep" of these residences. Held that his only unmarried daughter occupying the residences was liable, not only for feu-duties, landlord's taxes, and repairs, but also for the annual interest on bonds and the premiums on insurance over the residences. Held also that, in the event of there not being in any year sufficient revenue to pay the allowance in full, payment of arrears fell to be made up out of the income of future years. Glover's Trustees v. Glover, p. 115.

Testament—Construction—Liferent or right of occupancy of house—Incidence of burdens—Fee and liferent.

9. A testator, in bequeathing the residue of his estate in shares to his son in fee and to his daughters and their issue in liferent and fee respectively, expressed the desire that his children so long as they remained unmarried should live together in his house; and directed his trustees when either his son or all his daughters should be married, whichever of these events should first occur, to convey the house to his son. He also declared that, as his unmarried daughters would on the son's marriage be deprived of a residence, the son should thereupon pay to each unmarried daughter an annuity of £50, terminable on marriage. Held that the unmarried children had a mere right of occupancy, and not a life interest, of the house; and therefore were not liable in payment of any annual burdens and charges thereon beyond those payable by a tenant occupier. Montgomerie-Fleming's Trustees v. Carre, p. 1018.

Testament—Construction—Fee or life interest—Gift of fee—Direction that fee should be alimentary—Repugnancy.

10. By his settlement a testator directed his trustees to realise his whole estate, "and thereafter (subject always to the discretionary power vested in my trustees hereinafter mentioned) to divide" the proceeds thereof equally among his children and the issue of predeceasing children. There followed a declaration that, "notwithstanding the power of division above mentioned," the trustees should have the most absolute discretionary power to retain any of these shares instead of paying them over, and to pay over the annual income only derived from the share or shares so retained, or to pay the capital thereof by such instalments, and at such times, as they might determine; and a further special declaration "that the whole provisions hereunder in favour of my son J. W. are purely and strictly alimentary, and the same shall not be attachable by the debts or deeds of the said J. W., nor attachable by the diligence of his creditors," and that any share retained by the trustees under their discretionary power should be subject to this declaration. There was no ulterior destination of the shares of residue. In a special case, in which the trustees stated that they saw no occasion to exercise their discretionary power, and were prepared to hand over J. W.'s share to him, if they had power to do so, held (1) that under the direction to divide the estate among the testator's children a right of fee was conferred on J. W., which was not withdrawn by the subsequent declarations; (2) that, this being so, the declaration that the provision to J. W. should be alimentary was ineffectual; and, accordingly, that the trustees were entitled to pay over to him his share of residue. Watson's Trustees v. Watson, p. 1133.

Bequest in lieu of conventional provision—Marriage-contract provision to children—Bequest to children with conditional institution of their issue—Deduction of marriage-contract provision from share falling to issue.

11. A testator by his settlement bequeathed the residue of his estate to his children equally, "the issue of any of them predeceasing taking the parent's place and share," vesting being postponed till the occurrence of a particular event. This bequest was declared to be in satisfaction of a provision to the children already made in the testator's marriage-contract. A son of the testator survived him, and thus became entitled to claim a share of the marriage-contract provision, but died before the term of vesting of the residuary bequest, leaving issue. On his death his share of the marriage-contract provision was claimed by his executor; his share of the residuary bequest, on the other hand passed to his issue. Held that the amount of the marriage-contract provision payable to the son's executor fell to be charged exclusively against the share of the residue falling to his issue, and not against the whole residuary estate. Scott v. Graham, p. 467.

SUCCESSION—Continued.Legacy—Condition—Purification—Undertaking to satisfy condition.

12. A testator bequeathed the liferent of the residue of his estate to his widow, and directed the payment of certain legacies on his death. He further provided that his widow might consent to the payment of any or all of the legacies during her life, and that, should she surrender her liferent, his trustees might make payment of the legacies, in whole or in part, on such surrender. One of the legacies was to the University of Glasgow, for the endowment of a chair, and was made subject to the declaration that "should either I or my wife endow any chair in the Glasgow or other University before the death of the survivor, then this bequest shall fall." The testator's widow surrendered the liferent and other provisions of the settlement, elected to take her legal rights, and executed a formal deed in which she confirmed this election and surrender, and consented, so far as she competently could, to the immediate payment of the whole legacies, and further bound herself "not to endow any chair in the Glasgow or other University now or at any time hereafter." Held that the condition attached to the legacy had not been satisfied, and that payment thereof could not be made until after the death of the widow. Jacks's Trustees v. Jacks, p. 816.

Destination to testator's "heirs in mobilibus"—Period at which heirs ascertained—Object of gift.

13. A testator by his testamentary settlement directed his trustees to hold a portion of the residue of his estate in equal shares for his son and daughter in liferent, and for their issue respectively in fee, vesting in the issue being suspended till their parent's death. It was declared that, if either child died without leaving issue, the share liferented by him or her should fall to the testator's "heirs in mobilibus," and that neither of the testator's children should "have any vested right in the capital." Both of the testator's children survived him, and thereafter the daughter died without issue, but leaving a will. Held that the testator's heirs in mobilibus fell to be ascertained at his death and not at the death of the daughter, and accordingly that the share liferented by the daughter fell to be divided equally between the son and the daughter's executor. Hannay's Trustees v. Graham, p. 476.

Destination to "heirs and executors"—Period at which heirs ascertained—Vesting—Marriage-contract.

14. Under an antenuptial marriage-contract the trustees were directed to pay the income of the funds settled by the wife to her husband during his life should he survive her and, on the death of the survivor of the spouses, to pay these funds (1) to the children of the marriage if and when they attained majority; or (2) should the wife predecease her husband without leaving issue, or should issue survive her but predecease her husband without attaining majority, to such persons as the wife might appoint, and failing appointment, "to her heirs and executors whomsoever." The wife died (without having made any such appointment), survived by her husband and by one child. The child died in infancy during the lifetime of the husband. On the death of the husband the funds were claimed (1) by his testamentary trustees, on the ground that the child, being also the wife's heir, had acquired a vested right therein, which had passed to the husband as its heir, and (2) by relatives of the wife as her heirs, at the date of (a) the child's death, or (b) the husband's death. Held on a construction of the terms of the marriage-contract that the funds fell to be paid to the heirs of the wife as ascertained at the death of the husband. Muirhead's Trustees v. Torrie, p. 85.

Destination to "heirs, executors, and assignees"—Mutual settlement.

15. A husband and wife executed a mutual settlement by which, "for the mutual love and affection which we bear to each other," the husband assigned and disposed to his wife, "in case she shall survive me, and to her heirs, executors, and assignees whomsoever," the whole estate of which he should die possessed, and the wife assigned and disposed to her husband, "in case he shall survive me, and to his heirs, executors, and assignees whomsoever," the whole estate of which she should die possessed. The spouses reserved power "to us and each of us during our joint lives to alter or revoke these presents." In exercise of this reserved power the husband made a will, in which, after providing for certain legacies, he bequeathed his whole moveable estate to his wife. The wife made no further testamentary disposition. The husband died first, and after the wife's death a question arose as to the destination of her property, which consisted solely of the estate which she had taken under her husband's will. Held that the bequest by the wife in the mutual settlement to her husband, and to his heirs, executors, and assignees, was conditional upon his survivance of her, and that, as he had predeceased, the destination did not take effect, and her property fell to her heirs in mobilibus ab intestato. Garden's Executor v. More, p. 285.

Conditions—Clause of forfeiture in the event of gift being impugned—Impugning—Statement of contentions in special case that conditions of gift invalid.

16. A deed of appointment containing both valid and invalid provisions concluded with a forfeiture clause, which declared that any of the appointees who impugned the appointment "in any manner of way" should forfeit all interest, "to the same effect" as if they had been expressly excluded from any share in the appointed fund. Held that parties to a special case, brought to determine the validity of the deed, who were appointees under the deed, and who had stated contentions questioning the validity of provisions and conditions affecting their shares, would not thereby, under the forfeiture clause, have forfeited their right to benefit under the deed had the deed been valid. Collins's Trustees v. Collins, p. 588.

Faculties and Powers—Validity of exercise of power—Power to appoint fund among children—Appointment of liferent of part of the fund to one object of the power, and whole fee to the other object.

17. By a contract of marriage it was provided that the trustees should hold the capital of the trust funds "as a provision for behoof of the child or children" of the marriage, divisible "in such shares and proportions" as the spouses jointly or the survivor might appoint, and failing appointment, then equally. The husband died survived by his wife and by a son and a daughter. Held that a deed executed by the surviving wife, whereby she appointed a liferent interest only in part of the trust fund to her son, and the fee of the whole fund to her daughter or the daughter's heirs, was a valid exercise of the power. Pringle's Trustees v. Basta, p. 172.

Faculties and Powers—Validity of exercise of power—Separation of valid and invalid provisions—Clause of forfeiture in the event of deed of appointment being impugned—Effect of clause on validity of deed.

18. A deed of appointment containing both valid and invalid provisions concluded with a forfeiture clause, which declared that any of the appointees who impugned the appointment "in any manner of way " should forfeit all interest, " to the same effect " as if they had been expressly excluded from any share in the appointed fund. In a special case brought to determine the validity of the deed of appointment, held that the effect of the forfeiture clause was to bind the conditions of the deed so closely together that (apart from other considerations) it was impossible to separate the valid provisions from those which were ultra vires, and that accordingly the deed was wholly invalid, and that the fund fell to be divided as if there had been no deed. Collins's Trustees v. Collins, p. 588.

Accumulations—Thellusson Act—Election—Equitable compensation—Applicability of Thellusson Act to accumulation for equitable compensation.

19. By his trust-disposition and settlement a testator directed his trustees to hold his estate for his only child, a daughter, in liferent, and, on her death, to convey the fee to her issue, whom failing, to other persons named. The daughter having claimed and received legitim, the trustees retained and accumulated the income of the estate. On the expiry of twenty-one years from the testator's death the daughter brought an action against the trustees concluding for payment to her of the future income of the estate on the ground that further accumulation was prohibited by the Thellusson Act and that the income fell to her as her father's heir. In defence it was averred that the accumulated income had not sufficed to replace the capital withdrawn by the pursuer in name of legitim; that under the principle of equitable compensation the income fell to be accumulated till the capital was so replaced; and that accumulation for this purpose was not within the operation of the statute. Held (by the Lord Ordinary, Hunter) that further accumulation of the income was prohibited by the Thellusson Act, and decree pronounced in favour of the pursuer. Hutchison v. Grant's Trustees, p. 1211.

Vesting—Direction to convey at postponed period—Issue to take predeceasing parent's share—Whether gift to issue subject to conditions affecting parent's share.

20. A testator directed his trustees to hold a share of the residue of his estate for his eldest son in liferent and his issue, if any, in fee, declaring that in the event of the death of that son without issue, the capital of his share should fall and belong to the testator's two other sons and his three daughters " equally among them, and the survivors and survivor of them, the issue of any of them predeceasing being entitled equally among them, if more than one, to their deceased parents' share." The liferenter died without issue predeceased by two of his sisters, who, however, left issue, some of whom, though surviving their parent, predeceased the liferenter. Held that, as the issue were called in place of their deceased parents and not as original legatees, the gift to them was subject to the same conditions as the gift to their parents; and accordingly that no vesting had taken place in the issue who predeceased the liferenter. Addie's Trustees v. Jackson, p. 681.

Vesting—Legacy—Legacies conditional and unconditional payable on death of liferentrix—Surrender of liferent—Acceleration of payment.

21. A testator in his settlement directed his trustees to pay to his widow the income of the residue of his estate in full of her rights, but with power to her " to consent to payment of all or one or more of the legacies " thereafter bequeathed, " . . . so as to admit of payment thereof during her life." He then directed the payment of a number of legacies " upon the death of my said wife, or should she surrender her life-estate over any part thereof so as to admit of payment, then for payment of such part on such surrender." Some of the legacies were unconditional, others were bequeathed subject to a clause of survivorship and conditions in favour of the issue of the legatees. He also directed that any surplus of residue after payment of legacies should be at the disposal of the trustees to apply in augmenting all or any of the legacies, or in helping institutions akin to those to which legacies had been given. After the husband's death the widow elected not to accept the provisions of the settlement in her favour, and claimed her legal rights, and thereafter executed a formal deed in which she confirmed this election and surrendered her whole rights under the settlement, and consented, so far as she competently could in exercise of the power conferred upon her in the settlement, to the immediate payment of the whole of the legacies. Held (1) that the widow, having surrendered the whole of the provisions of the settlement in her favour, was debarred from exercising the power of consent; (2) that the unconditional legacies having vested indefeasibly at the death of the testator, were, owing to the surrender of the life-estate, payable immediately, provided the trustees had sufficient funds to pay all the other legacies; (3) that the contingent legacies, in which vesting was postponed until the death of the widow, were not payable until that event, the period of vesting being in no way accelerated by the surrender of the life-estate. Jacks's Trustees v. Jacks, p. 815.

Vesting—Fee or life-estate—Direction to "divide" residue among children—Restriction of child's share to life-estate with fee to issue—Repugnancy.

22. By his settlement a testator directed his trustees "to divide" the residue of his estate "equally among" his children, and "with regard to the portion of residue which may effeir or belong to" one of his sons, he appointed his trustees to "hold and invest the same in their own names" for the son and the son's widow in life-estate alienably and for the son's issue in fee. The son having died unmarried, held that his share of residue had vested in him in fee. Cowan's Trustee v. Jardine, p. 927.

Election—Effect of election—Approbate and Reprobate—Provision of life-estate to widow, with power to accelerate payment of legacies—Jus relictæ claimed and life-estate surrendered—Right thereafter to exercise power of accelerating.

23. A testator in his settlement directed his trustees to pay to his widow the income of the residue of his estate in full of her legal rights but with power to her "to consent to payment of all or one or more of the legacies" thereafter bequeathed, "... so as to admit of payment thereof during her life." He then directed the payment of a number of legacies "upon the death of my said wife, or should she surrender her life-estate over any part thereof so as to admit of payment, then for payment of such part on such surrender." Some of the legacies were unconditional, others were bequeathed subject to a clause of survivorship and conditions in favour of the issue of the legatees. After the husband's death the widow elected not to accept the provisions of the settlement in her favour, and claimed her legal rights, and thereafter executed a formal deed in which she confirmed this election and surrendered her whole rights under the settlement, and consented, so far as she competently could in exercise of the power conferred upon her in the settlement, to the immediate payment of the whole of the legacies. Held (1) that the widow, having surrendered the whole of the provisions of the settlement in her favour, was debarred from exercising the power of consent. Jacks's Trustees v. Jacks, p. 815.

Election—Equitable compensation—Provision "in full of" jus relictæ—Claim for jus relictæ—Right of widow to revert to testamentary provisions on amount of jus relictæ being restored to estate.

24. By a general settlement a husband made certain provisions for his wife which he declared should be "in full of all her claims of terce, jus relictæ, and others legally competent to her" against his estate, but there was no declaration that the provisions should be forfeited if she claimed her legal rights. Question whether her election not to accept the provisions of the settlement in her favour, but to claim her legal rights, resulted in her forfeiting her testamentary provisions finally, or merely gave rise to a claim of equitable compensation to the estate. Jacks's Trustees v. Jacks, p. 815.

Entail—Obligation by heir in possession to repay improvement expenditure undertaken by tenant of entailed subjects—Action by tenant's executors against succeeding heir in possession for repayment.

4. Sir A. M., an heir of entail in possession, granted a lease of the mansion-house and policies on the entailed estate, and entered into agreements with his tenant in terms of which the latter undertook to execute certain improvements upon the subjects let, Sir A. binding himself and the heirs of entail succeeding him (and subsidiarie his heirs, executors, and representatives whomsoever) to repay to the tenant, at the date of Sir A.'s death, a proportion of the certified cost of these improvements, the amount payable not to exceed a certain fixed sum. The tenant executed improvements, the certified cost of which exceeded the fixed sum, and predeceased Sir A. After the death of the latter the tenant's executors brought an action against the heir succeeding Sir A. in possession of the entailed estate in which, founding on sec. 1 of the Entail Trustees—Resignation—New trustees—Appointment of Canadian trust company as trustees.

2. The trustees acting under a Scotch antenuptial contract of marriage and an English marriage-settlement, made on the marriage of a Scotsman to an Englishwoman, were the same parties, viz., the spouses themselves, who had left Scotland and settled in Canada, and two other persons who resided in England. The trustees presented a petition to the Court to appoint as trustees, in place of the petitioners, a Canadian trust company incorporated by special Act of Parliament of the Dominion, and having power, inter alia, to undertake the office of trustee; and to authorise the petitioners to transfer the trust funds to the company and to resign. The company entered into a formal obligation, in the event of their appointment, to submit to the jurisdiction of the Court of Session in all matters relating to the trust and to obey all orders of the Court thereanent, and assigned the chambers of a firm of Glasgow writers as their domicile of citation. The Court refused the prayer of the petition. Stewart's Trustees, p. 647.

Termination of trust—Discretionary power to trustees to continue trust till estate cleared of debt—No reasonable prospect of debt being paid—Right of fiar to terminate trust—Succession—Testament—Construction.

3. A truster declared it to be his wish and intention that the trust should continue for ten years after his death and such further period as his trustees might consider necessary and expedient for carrying out the "ultimate object" of the trust (viz., the freeing of the heritable estate from debt) "in so far as this may reasonably be attained." Thirty-five years after the truster's death the estate had not been freed from debt, and the person who, if the period for distribution had arrived, was entitled to the fee demanded that the trustees should denude in his favour. Certain annuities charged on the estate were still current, and, as the fiar was alleged to be financially embarrassed, it was suggested that, if the trustees denuded in his favour, payment of the annuities might be endangered. Circumstances in which held that, as the trustees admitted that there was no prospect that the estate could be freed of debt within any time that could be specified, they were bound to denude in favour of the fiar. Sinclair's Trustees v. Sinclair, p. 178.

Liability of trustees—Negligence of original trustee—Action by assumed trustees—Alleged delay and contributory negligence of pursuers—Right to maintain action for behoof of beneficiaries—Mora.

4. One of the original trustees acting under a trust-disposition and settlement died in 1887, and in the same year two new trustees were assumed, one of whom was also a beneficiary under the trust. In 1909 these new trustees, suing in their capacity as trustees, brought an action against the representatives of the deceased trustee for recovery of funds which they alleged had been lost to the trust-estate through his negligence. The defenders pleaded that the pursuers were barred by mora, and by the fact that they had themselves been guilty of negligence which had contributed to the loss. Held that, as the pursuers were suing as trustees for behoof of the beneficiaries whom they represented, the plea of bar stated against them was unavailing. Lees's Trustees v. Dun, (H. L.) p. 12.

Administration—Powers of trustees—Power of investment limited by trust-deed—Application to nobile officium of the Court for enlarged power.

5. A testator by his trust-settlement, after directing that a hospital should be endowed with the residue of his estate, stated it to be his "particular desire" that the money devoted to this purpose should be, and remain, invested in landed property, and provided that if any portion of such property should be sold, the proceeds should be invested in the purchase of other land. The trustees presented a petition to the nobile officium of the Court for power to sell a portion of the estate, and to invest the proceeds in "approved trust securities," by which method of investment they stated that a considerably larger income would be obtained than by the purchase of land. The Court refused the petition, holding that they had no power to grant a relaxation of the specific restrictions on investment contained in the trust-deed. Scott's Hospital Trustees, p. 289.

VALUATION ACTS. Subjects—Advertisement board—Whether board a heritable erection falling to be entered in roll—Lands Valuation (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1895, sec. 4.

1. Opinions reserved upon the question whether an advertisement board erected on a piece of vacant ground was a "heritable erection," within the meaning of sec. 4 of the Lands Valuation

(Scotland) Amendment Act, 1895, falling to be entered in the Valuation-roll. A. J. Wilson & Co., Limited, v. Assessor for Kincardineshire, p. 704.

Subjects—Advertisement board—Site of board—Contract permitting erection of board—Whether owner of land or owner of board the “occupier” of site—Statute—Applicability to Scotland—Lands Valuation (Scotland) Act, 1854, secs. 1 and 6—Advertising Stations (Rating) Act, 1889, sec. 3.

2. The owner of hotel premises entered into an agreement with a firm of billposters by which, for an annual payment of 10s. 6d., he permitted them to affix an advertisement board for tyres to a part of his premises to be afterwards determined. The permission was to remain in force for three years and thereafter to be ended by three months' notice from either party. The agreement provided that the firm should have reasonable access to the premises for purposes connected with the board, and also that no other advertisement of a tyre was to be displayed on the premises. Following on this agreement a board was erected on a strip of vacant ground in front of the hotel and the “site” of the board was entered by the Assessor in the Valuation-roll at the yearly rent or value of 10s. 6d. and the firm of billposters as “tenants” and “occupiers.” In an appeal at their instance they contended that they should not have been entered as tenants or occupiers in respect (1) that the agreement was not a lease but a licence, (2) that under sec. 3 of the Advertising Stations (Rating) Act, 1889, the owner of the land being the person who “permitted” the ground to be used for advertisement must be deemed to be the “occupier.” Held that the entry was correct under the Lands Valuation Acts in respect that the agreement was in effect an ordinary lease of a portion of land at a yearly rent, and that the Act of 1889 (if applicable to Scotland, as to which opinions reserved) in no way altered the prescribed mode of making up the Valuation-roll under the Valuation Acts. A. J. Wilson & Co., Limited, v. Assessor for Kincardineshire, p. 704.

Subjects—Sewers and purification works in burgh—“Lands and heritages”—Value—Method of valuation.

3. Held that sewers and sewerage purification works in a burgh were “lands and heritages” within the meaning of the Lands Valuation (Scotland) Act, 1854, and as such fell to be entered in the Valuation-roll at their true and not at a merely nominal value. Observations on the principles upon which their yearly value should be determined. Assessor for Aberdeen v. Magistrates of Aberdeen, and Assessor for Lanark v. Magistrates of Lanark, p. 712.

Value—Harbour—Revenue principle—Revenue—Sum paid by tenant as penalty for failure to implement condition of lease.

4. The commissioners of a harbour leased a portion of the subjects belonging to them under a condition that, if the lessees had not, by a certain date, formed a company for the purpose of constructing a graving dock thereon, the lease should be null and void, and the lessees should forfeit a certain sum to the lessors. The lessees failed to form the company, and paid the forfeit. Held that the Assessor, in determining the yearly value of the harbour undertaking for the following year upon the revenue principle, was not entitled to include in revenue the sum paid as forfeit to the harbour commissioners. Burntisland Harbour Commissioners v. Assessor for Burntisland, p. 697.

WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT, 1906. Arbitration—Procedure—Preliminary defences—Duty of arbitrator to dispose of whole case.

1. Where an arbitrator had allowed a separate proof on preliminary defences and had issued findings thereon without having heard the case as a whole, opinions that, there being no exceptional circumstances calling for the procedure followed, the arbitrator ought to have heard and disposed of the case as a whole. Ellis v. Fairfield Shipbuilding and Engineering Co., Limited, p. 217.

Agreement by workman to take compensation—Reduction on ground of minority and lesion.

2. A minor, injured by an accident in the course of his employment, agreed, without consulting his father, to accept compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906. After compensation had been paid for some time he brought an action of damages for his injury at common law, in which he averred that he had accepted the statutory compensation in ignorance of his common law claim; and contended that, being a minor, he was not bound by the agreement, and that, in any event, it should be reduced on the ground of minority and lesion. Held that the pursuer was entitled to an inquiry into the facts. M'Feetridge v. Stewarts & Lloyds, Limited, p. 773.

Sec. 1 (1)—"Accident"—Death due to heart failure.

3. In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, the arbitrator found that a farm labourer, apparently in good health, died suddenly while engaged, in the course of his ordinary work, in lifting baskets of corn to feed a bruising machine; that the cause of death was "failure of the heart"; and that "a contributing cause of the failure of the heart's action was the strain arising from the exertion made by the deceased in repeatedly stooping to fill the basket with corn and then lifting it when full up to the level of his shoulders in order to feed the bruiser." Held that there were no facts stated from which the arbitrator could competently infer that the death was due to injury by accident within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, since there was no particular event or occurrence to which the death could be attributed. Ritchie v. Kerr, p. 613.

Sec. 1 (1)—"Accident"—Pneumonia following upon chill—Chill due to partial immersion in water accumulating in a mine through breakdown of a pump.

4. During the working time in a coalpit, which was a wet pit, water began to accumulate owing to a defect in the pump; and the pump being stopped for repair, the water accumulated still further. When the miners found the water rising they decided to leave the pit, and hastened to the pit bottom, where they were kept waiting for twenty minutes, during which time they were severely chilled by the water which rose to their knees, and by exposure to the current of cold air descending the shaft. One of these miners on reaching the pit head lingered there for at least twenty minutes, and on arriving at his home complained of chill, and next day suffered from a cough, hoarseness, and pains, but went to his work. After several days—on three of which he worked at the pit—he was found to be suffering from pneumonia, of which he ultimately died. Held that the occurrence in the mine on the day in question was an "accident," and that there was evidence on which the arbitrator might competently find that the deceased's pneumonia was due to that occurrence. Drylie v. Alloa Coal Co., Limited, p. 549.

Sec. 1 (1)—“ Accident ”—Pneumonia following upon chill—Chill due to standing in a draught while waiting to be raised from a mine.

5. During the working time in a coalpit the miners, owing to a wreck in the shaft of the mine, were ordered to ascend to the surface, and proceeded, in obedience to instructions, to the downcast shaft, where they were compelled to wait at a mid-landing for an hour and a half. During this period the miners, who had been sweating at their work, were exposed to a very strong draught from the air passing down the shaft for the ventilation of the mine, and on reaching the surface one of them complained of a chill. On this chill pneumonia supervened, and resulted in the death of the miner. Held that there was no evidence on which it could competently be found that the deceased's death was due to an “injury by accident.” Brown v. John Watson, Limited, p. 593.

Sec. 1 (1)—“ Accident ”—Pleurisy following upon chill.

6. A collector and canvasser, who had contracted pleurisy, claimed compensation from his employers, averring that in order to finish his work timeously one day he had to over-exert himself in climbing the stairs of a tenement; that he became “sweated” and contracted a chill which developed into pleurisy; and that he thus sustained an accident in the course of his employment. The arbitrator, without allowing a proof, dismissed the application as irrelevant, holding that the workman had failed to aver an “accident” within the meaning of the Act. In an appeal, held that the arbitrator was right. M'Millan v. Singer Sewing Machine Co., Limited, p. 346.

Sec. 1 (1)—“ Accident ”—Deafness following upon chill—Chill due to voluntarily waiting in water accumulated in mine through breakdown of a pump.

7. A miner, about to ascend to the surface at the end of his shift, in order to be among the first to obtain a place in the cage, stood for upwards of thirty minutes in a pool of water which had accumulated in the pit bottom owing to a defect in the pump. Had he waited his turn upon dry ground, as he might have done, he could have reached the cage comparatively dry. Owing to the wetting he contracted a chill which produced deafness, causing incapacity. Held that the incapacity was not due to injury by accident in the sense of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906. M'Luckie v. John Watson, Limited, p. 975.

Sec. 1 (1)—“ Out of and in the course of the employment ”—Prohibited act outwith employment—Cleaning machinery in motion.

8. A workman was employed in a factory as underman at a mangle. His duties were to carry the cloth to and from the mangle and to assist the headman in putting it on to the rollers. It was no part of his duty to be inside the rail fencing the mangle or to interfere with the mangle while working. Cleaning machinery while in motion was prohibited, but on two days in each week the machinery was stopped in the early morning for cleaning, and it was the duty of the workman to assist the headman to clean the mangle at these times. While the machinery was in motion, and in the absence of the headman, the workman, without orders, went inside the rail and attempted to clean a part of the mangle, and was injured. Held that the accident did not arise out of and in the course of his employment. M'Diarmid v. Ogilvy Brothers, p. 1103.

Sec. 1 (1)—“ Out of and in the course of the employment ”—Miner taking upon himself duty not entrusted to him.

9. A repairer was engaged in making repairs on an air course in a mine, and it was necessary for him to bring wood to that place for the purpose. This could be done by hauling the wood up the air course, or by taking it up in hutches by a wheel brae, and the repairer was directed to take it by the air course and not by the wheel brae. He elected, however, to take it by the latter, and in the absence of the person in charge he loaded the empty hutch in an unskilful manner with the result that the chain broke, and he was struck by the descending full hutch and killed. Held that the repairer was killed while arrogating to himself a duty which he was neither engaged nor entitled to perform, and accordingly that the accident did not arise out of his employment. Burns v. Summerlee Iron Co., Limited, p. 227.

Sec. 1 (1)—"Out of and in the course of the employment"—Breach of rule—Miner doing shot-firer's work contrary to rule.

10. The use of explosives in a mine was regulated by statutory rules, which provided that every charge should be fired by a specially appointed shot-firer, and that, where the firing was done by electricity, it was the duty of the shot-firer himself to connect the charge with the cable, and thereafter to connect the cable with the firing apparatus, after seeing that all persons in the vicinity had taken shelter. A duly appointed shot-firer was in the habit of getting the miners to connect the charges with the cable, and on one occasion he handed the cable to a miner for the purpose of having it so connected, and, without waiting till this had been done and without ascertaining that all persons in the vicinity had taken shelter, coupled the cable to the firing apparatus. He then fired the shot, and the miner, who had attached the cable to the charge and had not had time to retire to a place of safety, was injured by the explosion. Held that the accident to the miner would not have happened but for his undertaking a duty which he was neither engaged nor entitled to perform, and accordingly that it did not arise out of and in the course of his employment. Smith v. Fife Coal Co., Limited, p. 662.

Sec. 1 (1)—"Out of and in the course of the employment"—Workman killed while returning from work.

11. A workman, employed underground in a coal mine, on finishing his day's work returned to the surface and was proceeding home by a track along the side of a private branch railway line, the property of his employers, when he was knocked down and killed by an engine at a point 400 yards distant from the mouth of the pit. Held that the accident did not arise out of and in the course of his employment. Graham v. Barr & Thornton, p. 538.

Sec. 1 (1)—"Out of and in the course of the employment"—Injury by falling slate during a gale.

12. During a severe gale a carter in charge of a horse and lorry within his employer's yard was struck by a sheet of corrugated iron blown from the roof of an adjoining building. Held that the arbitrator was not entitled to find that the accident arose out of the employment. Guthrie v. Kinghorn, p. 1155.

Sec. 1 (1)—"Out of and in the course of the employment"—Injury by falling slate during a gale.

13. During a severe gale an engineer's fitter was engaged in erecting machinery in an open yard near to a building from the roof of which slates were being blown. While stooping to adjust a large piece of machinery he was struck on the head by a falling slate and injured. Held that the arbitrator was entitled to find that the accident arose out of the employment. Adamson v. George Anderson & Co. (1905), Limited, p. 1038.

- Sec. 1 (1)—“ Out of and in the course of the employment ”—Ship's carpenter burned by shavings accidentally set on fire by shore labourer.*
14. A ship's carpenter, working on the poop of a vessel lying in harbour, was severely burned owing to some shavings by which he was surrounded being ignited by a match carelessly thrown down by a shore labourer. The carpenter's trousers happened to be saturated with inflammable oil which had leaked from a barrel he had shifted in the course of his work, and thus readily caught fire from the shavings. Held that he was injured by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. Manson v. Forth and Clyde Steamship Co., Limited, p. 921.
- Sec. 1 (1)—“ Out of and in the course of the employment ”—Unexplained death—Seaman found drowned—Inference from proved facts.*
15. In a claim for compensation by the dependants of a ship steward, who was last seen alive in his bunk, and was found drowned next day in the harbour near to the place where his ship had been lying, the arbitrator awarded compensation. Circumstances in which the Court recalled the award of the arbitrator, holding that there was no evidence to justify the inference that the accident which caused death arose out of the employment. Lendrum v. Ayr Steam Shipping Co., Limited, p. 331.
- Sec. 1 (3), First Schedule (17), Second Schedule (9)—“ Agreement ”—Agreement in settlement of claim for compensation—Liability denied but claim settled as though compensation due.*
16. Held that an agreement between a workman and his employers for the settlement of a claim for compensation by payment of a lump sum may be an “ agreement ” in the sense of the Workmen's Compensation Act (and so recordable) even though the employers dispute liability to pay compensation, if, in fact, they have agreed to the amount of the payment being fixed as though they were liable under the Act. M'Guire v. Paterson & Co., p. 400.
- Sec. 1 (3) and First Schedule (17)—Agreement for redemption of compensation by payment of lump sum—Reduction of agreement—Mutual error as to extent of injury.*
17. A workman, with the advice of his law-agent, agreed with his employers to accept a lump sum in settlement of a claim for compensation due to him in respect of injuries caused by an accident, and a memorandum of the agreement was recorded. In a subsequent action for reduction of the memorandum he averred that both parties were in error as to the extent of his injuries at the time when the agreement was made, both being under the belief that he would recover in a few weeks, whereas, as it turned out, he was permanently incapacitated. Held that these averments did not disclose a relevant ground for setting aside the agreement. M'Guire v. Paterson & Co., p. 400.
- Sec. 1 (3)—Arbitration—Competency—“ Question ” as to duration of compensation—Act of Sederunt, 26th June 1907, (2).*
18. The employers of a workman, who had been totally incapacitated by an accident, admitted liability under the Workmen's Compensation Act, tendered the amount of compensation due (as to which there was no dispute), and requested the workman to sign a receipt which contained this clause :—“ At the first or any subsequent payment liability is admitted only for the compensation to date of payment. Further liability, if any, will be determined week by week when application for payment is made.” The workman objected to this clause on the ground that he was entitled to have an unqualified admission of

- liability, refused to sign the receipt, and initiated arbitration proceedings. Held that there was a question between the parties as to the duration of the compensation which had not been settled by agreement, and, accordingly, that the arbitration was competent. Freeland v. Summerlee Iron Co., Limited, (H. L.) p. 8.*
- Sec. 1 (3), Second Schedule (9)—Act of Sederunt, 26th June 1907, secs. 11 (1) and 12—Arbitration to obtain award of compensation—Simultaneous application for warrant to record memorandum of agreement—Conjunction—Competency.*
19. A workman presented an application in the Sheriff Court for warrant to record a memorandum of agreement for payment of compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, in respect of an accident. The genuineness of the memorandum was disputed by his employers. While the application was pending he initiated arbitration proceedings to obtain an award of compensation under the Act in respect of the same accident. Held that the two proceedings could not competently be conjoined, and that the arbitration should be sisted until the application for the warrant had been determined. King v. Arniston Coal Co., Limited, p. 892.
- Sec. 2 (1)—Delay in giving notice and making claim—"Mistake or other reasonable cause."*
20. Held that, where a delay of more than six months in giving notice and claiming compensation was due to the workman's ignorance of the serious nature of his injury, it was occasioned by "mistake or other reasonable cause," within the meaning of sec. 2 (1) of the Act, and so was not a bar to the maintenance of proceedings for compensation. Ellis v. Fairfield Shipbuilding and Engineering Co., Limited, p. 217.
- Sec. 13—"Dependants"—Persons not in receipt of support but with legal right and prospect of enforcing—Children deserted by their father and maintained chiefly by their brothers—Competence of appeal on question of dependency.*
21. Held that a person may be dependent upon a workman at the time of his death within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, and so entitled to compensation, although he was in fact receiving at the time no support from the workman, provided that he had at the time a legal right to support, and that there was also a reasonable prospect of his being able to enforce and of his enforcing the right to a greater or less extent at some future period. Observed that the question of dependency is one of fact upon which the decision of the arbitrator is final, unless there is no evidence to support it, or unless he has misdirected himself upon a question of law. Circumstances in which held that there was evidence to justify the finding of an arbitrator that two pupil children were wholly dependent on their father's earnings at the time of his death in April 1911, and accordingly entitled to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, although they had received practically no support from him since March 1907. Young v. Niddrie and Benhar Coal Co., Limited, (H. L.) p. 66.
- Sec. 13, and First Schedule (1) (a) (ii.)—"Dependants"—Children deserted by father—Prospects of future support.*
22. Dependency is always a question of fact; and, even where children have been deserted by their father for three years before his death and have received no support from him during that time, they may still be held to be partially dependent upon him if there was a reasonable probability that, had he lived, he would in the future have contributed to their support. Dobbie v. Egypt and Levant Steamship Co., Limited, p. 364.

First Schedule (1) (a)—Where death "results" from the injury—Death from disease following on an accident.

23. A workman had a fall from a ladder whereby his ankle was injured, and he also suffered from general pain and shock, which lasted until, about a month after the accident, he was seized with violent internal pains and died from appendicitis peritonitis. In an arbitration upon a claim by his widow for compensation, in which two doctors were examined for each side, there was a conflict of medical evidence, one doctor, for the pursuer, saying that probably the workman "would have been alive now had he not met with the accident," the other that the condition of which the workman died "was consequent, indirect if you will, of the accident," and that "in all probability" he "would not have died but for the accident." The two doctors examined for the defenders could see no connection between the accident and the cause of death. Held that there was evidence to support the arbitrator's finding that death was the result of the accident. Euman v. Dalziel & Co., p. 246.

First Schedule (1) (a)—Where death "results" from the injury—Death from operation not confined to injury caused by accident.

24. A workman accidentally ruptured himself and was obliged to undergo an operation for hernia. In the course of the operation he was discovered to be suffering also from another old hernia and both were operated upon. He subsequently died from heart weakness and degeneracy "set up by the strain of the operation." Held that there was evidence to justify the arbitrator in finding that death was the result of the accident. Thomson v. Mutter, Howey, & Co., p. 619.

First Schedule (1) (b)—Where incapacity "results" from the injury—Refusal to undergo surgical operation.

25. A workman accidentally injured in the foot and thereby incapacitated, refused to undergo a simple operation which, it was reasonably certain, would have cured him. He acted on the advice of his own doctors, who were of opinion that the operation, though safe, would be useless. Held that he was precluded from claiming a continuance of compensation. O'Neil v. John Brown & Co., Limited, p. 653.

First Schedule (1) (b)—When incapacity "results" from the injury—Supervening aneurism.

26. A miner strained his back on 7th December 1911 and in consequence became incapacitated for work, but on 27th May resumed and continued at full work until 15th August when he became totally incapacitated owing to dilation of the heart caused by an aneurism of the aorta. He did not feel pain in the cardiac region or show any symptoms of heart trouble until July. Held that the arbitrator, who was of opinion that the aneurism was caused by the miner being engaged between May and August at work which was beyond his physical powers, was entitled to find that his present incapacity was not due to the accident of 7th December. Paton v. William Dixon, Limited, p. 1120.

First Schedule (1) (b) and (2) (c)—Average weekly earnings—Grade of employment—Change of grade—Appointment to work higher class machine dealing with finer material.

27. A girl in a rope and sailcloth factory, employed at a weekly wage of 7s. 6d. to work a drawing machine dealing with hemp which was afterwards spun into rope, was promoted to work, at a weekly wage of 8s., a drawing machine dealing with tow, a finer material which was afterwards woven into sailcloth. Five weeks after the change she was accidentally injured. Held that the change was a change in the "grade" of her employment within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, First Schedule (2) (c), and that compensation fell to be calculated on the basis of her average weekly earnings for these five weeks. Dalgleish v. Edinburgh Roperie and Sailcloth Co., Limited, p. 1007.

First Schedule (3)—Amount of compensation—Partial recovery—Review of weekly payments—Arbitrator's discretion.

28. When a workman, who has been totally incapacitated and has been receiving full compensation in terms of the Workmen's Compensation Act, partially recovers and is earning a wage, a prima facie case arises for reducing his compensation: but it is open to him to prove circumstances which will warrant the arbitrator, in the exercise of his discretion, in refusing to diminish the compensation. The circumstance that the compensation he has been receiving together with the wage he is earning does not equal his average weekly earnings before the accident does not by itself justify a refusal to diminish. Pryde v. Moore & Co., p. 457.

First Schedule (15)—Remit to medical referee—Ambiguous report—Competency of arbitrator sending report back to medical referee for explanation.

29. The report of a medical referee, to whom a remit has been made under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, First Schedule (15), may competently be sent back to him by the arbitrator for explanation, if it is ambiguous or unintelligible. Kennedy v. William Dixon, Limited, p. 659.

First Schedule (15)—Remit to medical referee—Finality of referee's report—Proof as to wage-earning capacity.

30. In an application to end the compensation payable to a miner who had received an injury to his eye, the question of his condition and his fitness for employment was referred to a medical referee under paragraph (15) of the First Schedule to the Act. The medical referee reported that "his condition is such that I consider he ought now to be fit to resume his ordinary work as a miner below ground." The miner having lodged answers in which he averred that he had not yet recovered from the effects of the accident and that his earning capacity was not restored, the Court allowed a proof as to the miner's wage-earning capacity, but excluded all evidence with regard to his physical condition and physical fitness for his ordinary work as a miner below ground, as on those points the medical referee's certificate was final. Cruden v. Wemyss Coal Co., Limited, p. 534.

First Schedule (16)—Review of weekly payments—Industrial disease—Recovery—Susceptibility to recurrence—Question whether susceptibility due to original attack—Onus of proof.

31. In an application by employers for the ending or diminishing of a weekly payment of compensation it was proved that the workman, after being duly certified as suffering from miner's nystagmus (an industrial disease), was awarded compensation, that he had "now completely recovered from this attack," but that he was susceptible to a recurrence of the disease. It was not proved whether the susceptibility was due to the original attack or to constitutional predisposition, the evidence being inconclusive. Held that, as the workman had recovered from the original attack, and as he had failed to discharge the onus which lay on him of proving that his susceptibility to recurrence of the disease was due to that attack, the compensation fell to be ended. Darroll v. Glasgow Iron and Steel Co., Limited, p. 387.

First Schedule (16)—Review—Minor workman—Probable earnings at date of review—General rise in wages—Agreement fixing probable earnings at prior date—Rise in wages between date of agreement and date of review.

32. The compensation payable to a minor workman was fixed by agreement at a weekly sum representing half the amount which, in the opinion of the parties, he would have been earning at the date of the agreement had he remained uninjured. Some months afterwards, in consequence of a general rise in wages, he applied to the Sheriff to have the compensation increased. Held that the fact that there had been a general rise in wages between the date of the agreement and the date of the application did not per se entitle the workman to an increase, but that it was merely one of the items to be taken into consideration by the Sheriff in determining for himself under paragraph 16 of the First Schedule to the Act the weekly sum which the workman would probably have been earning at the date of the review if he had remained uninjured. Malcolm v. Thomas Spowart & Co., Limited, p. 1024.

Second Schedule (9)—Recording of memorandum—Terms of memorandum differing from terms of agreement—Agreement to pay compensation in terms of the Act.

33. An injured workman and his employers verbally agreed that compensation should be paid to the former at the rate of 15s. 1d. per week. The workman thereafter signed a number of receipts, each of which bore to be for "weekly compensation to date under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, under which I claim for personal injury by accident sustained by me." Thereafter the employers objected to the recording of a memorandum which bore that the agreement was to pay compensation at the foresaid rate "until the same is ended, diminished, redeemed, or suspended in terms of" the Act, on the ground that the memorandum was not genuine, because it differed in terms from the agreement which contained no obligation as to future payments. Held that the arbitrator, who had granted warrant to record the memorandum, was right in so doing, in respect that the agreement was an agreement to pay compensation in terms of the Act, and that the memorandum merely set forth those terms. Pearson v. Babcock & Wilcox, Limited, p. 959.

Second Schedule (9)—Recording of memorandum—Genuineness—Written agreement—Terms of memorandum differing from terms of agreement.

34. A workman, who had been totally incapacitated by an accident, received weekly payments of 10s. from his employers, for which he granted receipts bearing that the payments were accepted "as the weekly compensation payable during the period of total incapacity for work as the result of the accident." He subsequently applied for warrant to record a memorandum which bore that the parties had agreed "that compensation be paid by" the employers to the workman "in terms of the Workmen's Compensation Act, at the rate of 10s. per week from" the date of the accident. Held that the memorandum was not genuine, in respect of the omission of the qualification "during the period of total incapacity." Pryde v. Moore & Co., p. 457.

Second Schedule (9) (d)—Agreement for redemption of compensation by payment of lump sum—Application to record—Duty of Sheriff-clerk to inquire into circumstances of agreement.

35. The Second Schedule (9) (d) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, provides that a Sheriff-clerk to whom a memorandum of agreement for the redemption of a claim for compensation by payment of a lump sum is brought, may refuse to record it if, "on any information which he considers sufficient," it appears to him that, by reason of the inadequacy of the sum or the means by which the agreement was obtained, the agreement should not be recorded. Held that the Sheriff-clerk is not bound in every case ex proprio motu to inquire into these matters before proceeding to record. Observations on the duties of the Sheriff-clerk in such a case. M'Guire v. Paterson & Co., p. 400.

Second Schedule (9) (d)—Act of Sederunt, 26th June 1907, sec. 12—Application to record memorandum—Agreement for redemption of weekly payment—Minute by workman objecting to adequacy of sum agreed on and to means by which agreement obtained—Reference by Sheriff-clerk to Sheriff—Competency of procedure.

36. Held that where, upon a minute lodged by a workman objecting to the recording of a memorandum of an agreement as to the redemption of a weekly payment on the grounds mentioned in paragraph (9) (d) of the Second Schedule, the matter was referred by the Sheriff-clerk to the Sheriff, it was the duty of the latter to determine the questions thus raised, notwithstanding that the minute was lodged by the workman and not by the Sheriff-clerk. Burns v. William Baird & Co., Limited, p. 358.

Second Schedule (17) (b)—A. S. 26th June 1907, sec. 17 (h)—Application for order on arbitrator to state case—Arbitrator's refusal to state question whether his findings in fact supported by the evidence led—Whether question one of law or fact.

37. A workman, dissatisfied with the arbitrator's statement of a case on appeal under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, presented a note for an order upon the arbitrator to state a case, averring that certain facts, other than those stated by the arbitrator, had been proved, and that certain of the arbitrator's findings were contrary to the evidence, and proposing as one of the questions of law the question "Whether there was evidence led before the Sheriff-substitute which could competently support his findings of fact?" He did not aver that there was no evidence before the arbitrator upon which he could proceed to a decision of the case. The Court refused the note, holding that it was in effect a request for the allowance of appeal upon a pure question of fact, upon which, under the Act, the arbitrator was final. Nelson v. Allan Brothers & Co. (United Kingdom), Limited, p. 1003.

Second Schedule (17) (b)—Remit to arbitrator for further statement of fact—Power of arbitrator to hear further evidence.

38. In a case stated for appeal against the decision of a Sheriff-substitute acting as arbitrator in proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, in the course of which proceedings proof had been led, the Court remitted to the Sheriff-substitute to find whether the workman had given statutory notice of his accident as soon as practicable thereafter. The Sheriff-substitute reported that he had himself re-examined the doctor who attended the workman during his illness, and made a finding in answer to the question put by the Court. This report was objected to on the ground that it proceeded on evidence which had been taken after the proof had been closed. Held that the Sheriff-substitute was entitled, under the remit, to take further proof, and objection repelled. Park v. Coltness Iron Company, Limited, p. 1163.

See Res Judicata.

WRIT. Deletions—Holograph testament—Authenticity of deletions.

1. A testatrix left certain holograph testamentary writings which were found in a locked desk in a chest of drawers in her house. The writings were contained in a closed envelope, which was addressed in the testatrix's handwriting to her brother, whom she appointed her executor. The writings contained a number of bequests, some of which had been scored through in ink. Held that the bequests deleted had been duly revoked, in respect that the inference to be drawn from the deletions themselves, and from the circumstances in which the writings were found, was that the deletions had been made by the testatrix herself with the intention of revoking the bequests. Milne's Executor v. Waugh, p. 203.
“Deed”—Minute of acceptance of office by trustees—Stamp Act, 1891, First Schedule.
2. Held that a minute of acceptance of office by trustees, engrossed upon a trust-disposition and settlement and signed by the trustees before two subscribing witnesses, was not a “deed” within the meaning of the First Schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891. Henderson's Trustees v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, p. 987.
“Deed of trust”—Deposit-receipt—Act 1696, cap. 25—Proof.
3. Held that a deposit-receipt is not a “deed of trust” within the meaning of the Act 1696, cap. 25. Cairns v. Davidson, p. 1054.
